UMass remains perfect

Women's lax now 3-0 after crushing Crimson

By Justin Pearson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

What a difference a year makes.

Just a year removed from an 0-4 start that propelled the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team to its first sub-.500 record since 1997, the Minutewomen have turned things around early in 2002, flying out of the gates to a 3-0 record behind a balanced attack and suffocating team defense.

Harvard	5

On Saturday afternoon, UMass picked up its third victory in as many outings, knocking off Harvard 9-5 at Garber Field. Lydia Robinson and Hope Zelinger each tallied a hat trick to spark the attack while at the other end of the field Cyndi Doyle made a season-high 15 saves in the UMass cage.

Trailing 3-2 early in the second half, the Minutewomen (3-0) scored four consecutive goals in three and a half minutes to take a 6-3 lead, an edge they did not relinquish for the rest of the contest. Robinson scored two of her career-high four goals during this stretch that saw UMass take control of what had been a very tight game in the opening 30 minutes.

The Maroon and White took its first lead of the game at 4-3 through junior Lori Kain seven and a half minutes into the second half, just 1:22 after Robinson had tied the contest by converting a feed from Kelli Kurtz. Kain fired home her fourth goal of the season to grab the advantage. UMass doubled its lead less than a minute later when Zelinger picked up her first goal of the game to make it 5-3.

While the UMass attack stole the show after halftime, it was the defense, Doyle in particular, who kept the Minutewomen in the game during the first half. Doyle made a save after save in the UMass net, holding Harvard to just two goals in the first 30 minutes.

"She's come out and played her game," said UMass head coach Phil Barnes of his junior goalkeeper. "She improves with each practice and each game and works really hard."

As the teams headed into halftime, they were deadlocked at 2-2 with defense being the overriding theme. Twice the Crimson (0-1) had taken the lead, first through freshman Elaine Belitsos six minutes into the game and then Jen Brooks with just under 10 minutes left. But each time the Minutewomen responded to level the scoreline.

"We started tight in the first 10-15 minutes of the game," said Barnes. "Our defense stepped up early on and our attack gained momentum later in the half. It was a great learning experience."

Much of that momentum came through junior midfielder Kelli Kurtz who scored her fourth goal of the season just 37 seconds before halftime to tie the score at 2-2.

After the break, though, it was all UMass as it outscored the Crimson 7-3 with Zelinger and Robinson each picking up three goals in the second half.

But while individuals may step up on any given day, it's been the collective team spirit of UMass that has shown brightest through the first three games of the season. A fact that is somewhat surprising considering the fact that 11 Minutewomen were not on the roster last season. Through its first three games, UMass has allowed just 15 goals while nine different players have tallied goals in 2002.

"It's just a lot better this year, it's entirely different from last year," Zelinger said. "The team chemistry is really good and everyone is so much more relaxed on the field. No one is tense out there."

"We all just have a different attitude this season," Robinson added. "It's a great feeling [to start 3-0] and we're all ready for the next game."

That next game will come on Thursday afternoon against New Hampshire at Garber Field. The Minutewomen will be looking for revenge on the Wildcats, who last season knocked them off 8-6 in an early season match-up in the Granite State.

Junior Lydia Robinson also netted at hat trick in her team's win versus Harvard.

Bracketville is busted

DAVID ROSE

So, tell me see if I have the NCAA Tournament brackets completely correct. UConn, which was barely in the Top 25 going into the Big East Tournes and won its three games by a combined 16 points, gets a No. 2 seed; Arizona, which was 14th in the country and won the Pac-10 tournes, including wins over California and USC, gets a No. 3 seed; Oklahoma, which beat Kansas for the Big XII title gets shafted out of a No. 1 seed; Marquette, which was eighth in the nation before it lost to Cincinnati in the Conference USA title game gets only a No. 3 seed; and Gonzaga, who won 29 games this season and was a top 10 team for 75 percent of the year only gets a No. 6 seed and a possible second round date with Arizona?

I am guessing the same people that thought the UMass-Xavier game last week also seeded the teams in this year's tournes. This seeding is a joke, almost as big of a joke as Boston College actually making the field of 65 with its biggest conference victory coming against St Bonaventure.

I would like the Selection Committee to tell me with a straight face which 20 teams are better than Gonzaga. The Zags did everything that was asked of them to garner a higher seed. They won 29 games, played against formidable opponents such as Illinois, Iowa, Marquette and St. John's, plus defeating conference foe Pepperdine twice this season. The Zags' No. 6 seeding would be considered ludicrous with their record anyway you cut it. However, when you consider that their final national ranking was sixth and they still only managed a No. 6 seed, it is outright preposterous.

Then, we get to teams such as Butler and Bowling Green that did not get automatic bids into the tournament, despite outstanding regular seasons. Butler won 25 games, including wins over Indiana and Purdue on the road, and did not get an invite. Just to equate what happened to the Bulldogs to another team, think about this: both Butler and Wisconsin lost in the first round of their respective conference tourneys. Both teams won their regular season titles and a low seed in the conference free-for-all bounced both. Both teams went 2-0 versus Indiana and Purdue this season. Looking at both teams, can you tell me any difference between the two? I can't, but because the Badgers are in a "power" conference, they get the bid and the Bulldogs are left shaking their heads.

Bowling Green is a team that beat Ole Miss, Michigan and made the MAC Finals, falling to Kent State. The Falcons were 24-8 on the season and made the tournes final, yet because they are in the MAC and not in the SEC, they were left out. The only excuse I see the NCAA Committee giving for BG not getting in is because it is named Bowling Green and its jerseys are orange (does that make any sense to you?).

I also think that the mid-majors also get a shaft based on the fact that two lower conference teams, Alcorn State and Siena, are in the play-in game. So basically, the NCAA is telling these two teams, "nice job actually winning your conference tourney, unlike bubble teams like BC, Utah and Wyoming. Your gift is that you actually have to beat a team to get to play with the other 63 teams that are already in the tournament. Better yet, you get to play Maryland in the first round. CONGRATULATIONS!!!"

What is this, some sort of comedy?

Why don't you have teams such as BC, Utah, Wyoming or Missouri play in the play-in game. These were the last teams into the field of 65. I know some people will say, "Maryland against BC in the first round is kind of a rough opener." That might be true, but Alcorn State and Siena actually earned the right to be in the tournament by winning their conference. If all it took was beating the Bonnies to make the Big Dance, these teams would also deserve invites; UMass, St. Joe's, Fordham, Temple, George Washington and Richmond. My guess is that none of those teams got invited.

The brackets are very misleading. People might be saying that because the WCC got two teams, the Mountain West Conference got three teams and the MVC got two teams, the mid-major conferences actually got a good deal this season.

As the old saying goes, "don't judge a book by its cover."

Gonzaga only getting a No. 6 seed, Butler and Bowling Green being left out and the fact that the RPI ratings of those teams may never get better because big conferences do not want to play them for fear of losing, this year's brackets might be the worst thing to happen for the mid-majors.

Sunshine sweet for Softball

Minutewomen win four in Tallahassee

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts softball team slugged through an endurance-testing six-game weekend at the Seminole Classic in Tallahassee, Fla. and came out of it with an impressive 4-2 record, bumping its season mark to 10-7.

Senior Jennifer Hadley improved her ERA to a paltry 0.38 after bookending the first and final games of the weekend. Hadley won the first contest with Southeastern Louisiana on four strikeouts, one walk, and six scattered hits, as the Minutewomen opened with a 3-0 victory. The three runs that UMass put across the plate was all that it would need, as Hadley and the defense held the Lions scoreless.

After the blazing start, however, the Minutewomen let one slide the next day, dropping a 5-3 decision to Southern Illinois. Massachusetts led most of the game, into the seventh inning after junior Kaila Holtz worked out of a no-out, bases loaded jam. Still, SIU continued to charge in the top half of the seventh, and notched five runs on five hits and a walk to take the lead. In the bottom half, UMass put one runner on base, but couldn't start a rally.

"Giving up five runs is a tough pill to swallow," Holtz said.

The Minutewomen bounced back the next game, however, and freshman pitcher Kelli Arnold earned her first shutout, blanking the Providence Friars. Also, the UMass bats woke up, and the Minutewomen scored eight runs on ten hits and four walks.

"Our response [to the loss to Southern Illinois] was very good," Head Coach Elaine Sortino said. "The key was our desire and heart, and some of our hitters started to come around.

"Kelli [Arnold] did a great job. She was one pitch away from a no-hitter. She was impressive, considering it's been almost a month since her last start."

Arnold last saw action in a six-strikeout victory over Texas Tech on Feb. 9.

However, the next game, with the Minnesota Golden Gophers, was a very different story. After holding Minnesota scoreless through the first three innings on no hits, the game started to slip, and the Gophers exploded for four runs in the fifth inning.

"We started great, but then everything came unglued," Sortino said. "We started to rush plays, but we learned from it."

The Minutewomen made things interesting in the bottom half of the seventh, when sophomore Jamie Cahalan led off with a single to left. Junior Emily Robustelli knocked freshman pinch runner Denise Denis in to make the score 8-2, and UMass continued to threaten, but left the bases juiced when junior Brandi Cross grounded out to second.

UMass finished off Saturday's trio of games in style, though, defeating No. 22 Florida State 3-2. Holtz once again took the hill, and held the Seminoles to one earned run on five hits and two walks. The Minutewomen plated their three on seven hits and five walks and Holtz worked out of another jam in the seventh to seal the victory.

"When you have the chance to redeem yourself right away, it's a good thing," said Holtz, referring to the fifteen minutes that the squad had after the Minnesota loss before they ran back out to face the Seminoles.

The win kept the Minutewomen in the tournament, and sent Florida State packing (not too far though, since FSU hosted the event). Their opponent in the Gold Round of the consolation bracket would be none other than the very same Southern Illinois Salukis that handed them the heartbreaking loss on Friday.

"We had revenge on our minds," Holtz said.

The Minutewomen used those vengeful feelings to their advantage, and Hadley finished out the weekend the way she started it, allowing only two hits and six walks for no earned runs. The only Saluki score came on a Hadley error in the second inning. Southern Illinois held the lead for the majority of the game, until UMass rallied in the bottom of the sixth, scoring all three runs on three hits and an error. Hadley remained strong in the top half of the seventh, striking out two to cement the 3-1 win.

Massachusetts athletes react to sports budget cuts

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Recent budget cuts and fee increases at the University of Massachusetts have had broad and sweeping effects on every person who sets foot on the campus on a regular basis.

Yesterday, the cuts reached athletics, when the Athletic Department announced the elimination of seven teams from the program. Volleyball, men's and women's water polo, men's indoor track and field, men's tennis, and men's and women's gymnastics were all eliminated, as of the end of the spring semester.

The men's gymnastic team posing for a photo of their 1999 ECAC championship trophy. This year will be their last run at the ECAC championship because of the recent budget cuts.

Shauna Nielsen

Ken Sheisler

While coaches and administrators have been in the spotlight recently, the cuts obviously affect one section of the population more than any other: the athletes. One hundred thirty-six athletes participate in the seven eliminated sports out of 800 varsity athletes in the program.

Shauna Nielsen is one of those athletes. Nielsen is a sophomore driver for the women's water polo team. She is also a swimmer on the women's team, which avoided elimination, but was an early possibility to join the seven other clubs, along with men's swimming.

Said Nielsen of the cuts, "I came here to play polo, and to swim. Now I can't do both. It's rough...It's a bad day."

Nielsen also addressed how her team is feeling as a result of losing the program.

"We're upset," Nielsen said. "Of course, we want to blame someone else, but it feels like they just gave us away because we're not from Massachusetts, and I don't like that."

The team includes members from California, Ohio and even Canada, but none from the Bay State. The men's water polo team is made up of a similar slice of the country. Many of the players are also from California, although there is also a strong Pennsylvanian presence, as well as three from Puerto Rico, but again, none from Massachusetts.

The men's indoor track team is almost the opposite. Most of the runners, jumpers, and throwers hail from Massachusetts, but the team suffered the same fate as water polo. Brian Cronin, a senior, is the captain of the team, and spoke about the cuts at length yesterday.

"I was shocked like everyone else, a little taken aback. We got a little hint of this a few weeks ago, but [coach Ken O'Brien] said he would do his best to stop it," Cronin said. "We work day in and day out, and we don't receive the kind of recognition and attention that some other teams receive."

Cronin expanded on the ramifications the cuts will have, and what they signify for the future.

"I think it's a little vignette of how the powerless and moneyless people in the state are being undercut," Cronin said. "They undercut some of the more important people at this school. We have high graduation rates, and we could contribute money back to the University if we can get good jobs. But that may not be as possible now."

He also spoke of how the elimination of small programs in the athletic department may signify the possibility of eliminations to small programs in academics, specifically in Journalism and English.

Mt. Holyoke to host radical speaker

By Jake Lilien
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Mount Holyoke's Odyssey Bookshop will host a lecture this evening by one of America's most famous – and most controversial – feminists.

Andrea Dworkin, author of radical feminist treatises such as Intercourse and Life and Death: Unapologetic Writings On the Continuing War Against Women, will appear at the bookshop at 8:00 tonight. Dworkin will read from her recent biography, Heartbreak: The Political Memoir of a Feminist Militant.

Heartbreak is both the tale of Dworkin's rise to prominence as a feminist writer and activist, and an account of the various forms of abuse she has endured throughout her life. In the memoir, she recounts numerous incidents of sexual molestation and rape, as well as an abusive marriage.

Dworkin is most famous for works such as Intercourse, in which she presents theories that are radical even by the standards of radical feminism. She has described heterosexual sex as being indistinguishable from rape, and has referred to women who actively take part in it as "collaborators."

"Intercourse with men as we know them is increasingly impossible," Dworkin wrote in her 1974 book, Woman Hating. "It requires an abortion of creativity and strength, a refusal of responsibility and freedom: a bitter personal death. It means acting out the female role, incorporating the masochism, self-hatred, and passivity, which are central to it. Unambiguous conventional heterosexual behavior is the worst betrayal of our common humanity."

Her works have earned her the praise of many in the contemporary feminist movement, including Gloria Steinem.

"Every century, there are a handful of writers who help the human race to evolve," Steinem once wrote. "Andrea is one of them."

They have also earned her the scorn of critics on all sides of the political spectrum. She holds a prominent place on Rush Limbaugh's list of "feminazis" for her views on men and heterosexuality. Yet she has also received a thorough condemnation from American Civil Liberties Union President Nadine Strossen, who devoted a book to criticism of Dworkin's views on pornography.

A browse through the reviews of her works posted on amazon.com reveals the varied reactions to Dworkin's theories. One reader writes in a review of Intercourse that, "This is one of those books that changed my life...I always had a queazy feeling about certain manifestations of sex in our culture, and Andrea Dworkin helped to articulate the problem for me."

Another reader, however, writes in a review of the same book that, "Readers who enjoy this one are bound to enjoy other celebrated classic uneducated rants such as 'Mein Kampf' by Adolf Hitler."

Herman Fong, Odyssey's events coordinator, expects tonight's event to garner a significant amount of attention.

"We've gotten a lot of calls about it," Fong said. "We're expecting a large crowd. It may be a full house.

"It should be a very interesting evening," he continued. "Some of Andrea Dworkin's thinking has been seen as very controversial over the years. It should be interesting to see what the audience's reaction is."

Six months later: mission not yet over, Pentagon says

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Operation Anaconda, the largest ground offensive in America's war on terrorism, continues in the mountains of eastern Afghanistan.

The battle has been raging for more than a week in the Shahi-Kot Valley near Gardez. Earlier this week Americans withdrew a part of the 1,200 troops in order to redeploy them. Air strikes have been targeting caves and bunkers in the mountainous area.

Air Force Gen. John W. Rosa commented on the operation during a press briefing yesterday.

"With much fewer in number, al Qaeda forces are still holed up in small pockets scattered throughout the area," Rosa said. "In the last 24 hours [Tuesday] we've flown more than 180 sorties over Afghanistan and dropped more than a hundred bombs, bringing the total bombs dropped in this operation to more than 2,500."

Despite reports from Afghan military leaders that al Qaeda are fleeing the area, Rosa says that the battle has not been won.

"I wouldn't characterize it as being over. Certainly the heaviest of fighting we've seen in the early days. The last 72 hours has been more sporadic, focused on smaller pockets of Taliban and al Qaeda," Rosa said.

"But in an area this big and this – this diverse, with as many caves, I would say that there is still work to be done."

Victoria Clarke, assistant secretary of Defense for Public Affairs, commented on reports that some Taliban and al Qaeda are negotiating with Afghan military commanders.

"What we've seen, and we've seen consistently, is the Afghans working with us to pursue the al Qaeda and the Taliban and working closely with us to make sure numbers of them don't escape, don't go back across the border, aren't free to continue to wreak the havoc in the country that they have been," Clarke said. "I'd be surprised if there weren't some reports of that. But what we've seen in general is close cooperation with the Afghans to make sure we can pursue those people."

After the briefing Clarke clarified her statement.

"During today's briefing I may have left the wrong impression regarding our policy on the surrender of al Qaeda and Taliban: Our mission is to capture or kill all al Qaeda and Taliban leadership," Clarke said. "It is not in anyone's interest for al Qaeda or Taliban leadership to be permitted to go free. The Afghan interim government is well aware of our position and expectations, and has been fully cooperative on this matter. We do not support releasing any al Qaeda or Taliban leadership."

Clarke also mentioned that in the six months since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the mission had not changed.

"It has been six months since September 11th, when we were first attacked. And it is always important to remember what we are about," Clarke said. "Our mission is to destroy terrorism around the world, the threat to our security, to our people, to our freedom. We will continue to seek out and destroy terrorist networks."

Faculty to vote on principles motion

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Rules Committee has drawn up a "Faculty and Librarian Declaration of Principle," which they will present to the Faculty Senate at their regular meeting Thursday.

Rules Committee members are representative from various departments and programs at the University of Massachusetts Amherst and are all concerned with the basic well being of the campus and its ability to give students a first rate education and opportunities. Their declaration is a strong move from the faculty to send the message to the Massachusetts Legislature that they will not accept what they see as the lack of support being shown them.

According to the Rules Committee's Declaration, Massachusetts now ranks fiftieth in terms of how much the state spends on higher education. This in itself is a reason that the Committee is attempting to show the state that it means business.

The declaration sets forth with a list of things that the Rules Committee holds as its primary concerns.

"We, the faculty and librarians of the University of Massachusetts are deeply, distressed at the budget cuts that have been inflicted on our campus and on the whole state higher education system...the silence surrounding those cuts...and the prospective loss for our students of access to a first rate affordable higher education," the document reads.

Following this statement, the declaration confirms the dedication of the faculty and librarians to the university, students, higher education and their "rededication to those objectives that brought us to this profession: the search for truth, meaning, creativity and understanding across the global reach of our disciplines."

In addition the declaration goes onto explain how the Rules Committee views the University and what the budget cuts will do to its reputation and ability to perform. It condemns the state for the harm it has thus far done, and the possible future implications to all concerned.

"Such a loss does irreparable harm to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and its citizens. It does economic harm, in that an investment in the University is an investment in the active citizens of the Commonwealth. It harms the prestige of Massachusetts...it harms the spirit of the state, in that students are now being told that if they cannot afford private education, then a second or third-class education is good enough for them...we believe that the value of the University is timeless," the declaration states.

Following the Rules Committee's presentation, the Faculty Senate will hear a Special Report by the Academic Matters Council concerning the Emergency Modification of the Requirements of Commonwealth College.

Commonwealth College and the Academic Matters Council are asking the Senate to temporarily reduce the number of courses the University currently requires students to take in order to graduate with the distinction of Commonwealth College scholar. The change is due to budgetary constraints on Commonwealth College, due to overall University budget cuts.

If approved, Commonwealth College students would only be required to take eight honors courses (and complete with a grade of B or better) instead of the current ten. Commonwealth College and the Academic Matters Council do not intend for this to be a permanent change and ask that the Senate authorize the Dean of the Commonwealth College to fully restore the courses to ten when the Dean judges that resources are again available.

Students in Commonwealth College may take more than the eight courses required but due to a lack of courses offered in coming semesters the College feels it is unreasonable to ask students to compete the ten courses.

The Faculty Senate will also hear the Annual Report of the Council on University Service, Public Service and Outreach: a Special Report by the General Education Council concerning Recommended Courses, and vote on whether to approve several courses to fulfill General Education Requirements.

The 603rd meeting of the Faculty Senate will be held on March 14, at 3:30 p.m. in Herter Hall 227.

Campus Activities Office hosted International Women's Day

By Rachel Smith
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Campus Activities Office sponsored several events last week in honor of International Women's Day on March 8. The program included several films, discussion panels, a book signing, workshops and a Women's Day Celebration in the Student Union. The "Something Every Friday" movie last week at the Top of the Campus was Chocolat, also in honor of International Women's Day.

International Women's Day is recognized by women's advocacy organizations across the globe, the United Nations and by a several nations as a national holiday. According to the official U.N. website, the inspiration for International Women's Day began in 1909 when the Socialist Party of America declared the last Sunday in February "National Women's Day." In 1910, The Socialist International declared that "Women's Day" would be celebrated in honor of the universal right to vote and women's struggles around the globe.

The first International Women's Day was celebrated March 19, 1911 in Austria, Denmark, Germany and Switzerland. Over one million people celebrated the holiday by attending rallies and demanding equal treatment for women in the working and political arenas.

One hundred and forty-six women, mostly between the ages of 13 and 23, died in the Triangle Shirtwaist Fire March 25, 1911 in New York City. In order to keep the seamstresses at work at the Triangle Shirtwaist Company, the owners locked all possible exits in the building. The female laborers couldn't flee to safety when the fire broke out thus sparking a national debate about safe working conditions and women's rights. While the Triangle Shirtwaist Fire is remembered during many International Women's Day celebrations, it was not the inspiration for the holiday. International Women's Day increased in popularity around the world during the early part of the 20th Century. The U.N. even attributes Russian Soviet Revolution in 1917 partly to the success of International Women's Day.

The holiday is now celebrated on March 8, although the United States recognizes the entire month of March as Women's History Month.

"We wanted to have a celebration," said Hind Mari, Assistant Director of RSO Events. "We wanted it to be a celebration, but we didn't want to neglect that women still have serious issues to deal with."

The free films included a documentary about indigenous people's activist Rigoberta Menchu; a film about celebrated blues performers including Ma Rainey, Ethel Waters, Ida Cox; and a documentary about the suffering of Israeli and Palestinian women who are victims in the ongoing conflict over territory in the West Bank. While the films focused on women's issues, the program culminated with a showcase of talented women and a free buffet courtesy of Earth Foods, People's Market, and other student run businesses.

"The celebration part is celebrating women's creativity. Reading their poetry, playing their instruments, having fun and socializing," said Mari. "The poets were from all over. We're excited about that. We wanted a combination of celebration and education."

Mari mentioned that the turnout to her events were, "somewhat low," but she was not disappointed with the outcome.

"I was touched. There was a woman, a professor at Boston University, who's enjoying her spring break with her daughter who lives in Northampton. Her daughter works all day so she looked through the paper for what was going on in the area and she thought this was the most interesting thing for her," Mari said. "So that made me feel good about the whole program."

Carol Mattos is a sophomore on the volleyball team. That team was in a different situation, as head coach Bonny Kenny resigned Feb. 7 to take the head coaching job at Delaware. Mattos felt that the team saw the elimination coming, hinting at the reluctance the athletic department showed in finding a new coach for the team.

"I'm still shocked," said Mattos, "because I want to stay. But we [underclassmen] are all looking for other schools. I'm definitely transferring, only the juniors will stick around."

There were some clues, Mattos said. A new floor was installed in the Curry-Hicks Cage, where the team plays its home matches, but no holes were installed to accommodate a volleyball net.

Mattos' feelings about staying at UMass were echoed by most of the athletes reached for comment.

"I'm disappointed, and upset that I won't be able to stay here. I didn't expect this, but I'll be looking at other schools," Scott Sans-Leeb, a freshman on the men's tennis team, said. "It's ridiculous that they cut the program this late [into the recruiting season]."

Emily Knight, sophomore goaltender for the women's water polo team, analogized the loss of the sport to finding out that an acquaintance from high school had died.

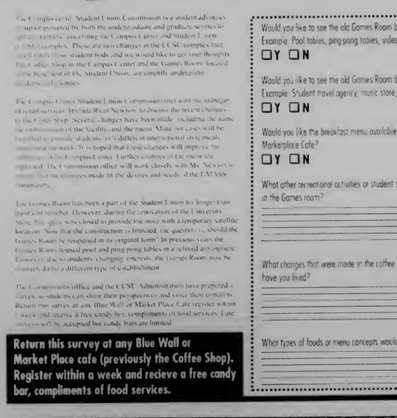
"It's disheartening. It's hard when you're being cut by people who probably don't know much about the sport," Knight said. "We're trying to stay as positive as possible."

When asked how the athletes could continue to compete at a high level, even with the imminent demise of their sport, Knight said, "It's for love of the team, and for love of the sport. It's a passion, really, and there's too much dedication to just give it up. It's about so much more than playing water polo."

Knight is in a similar situation to many of the water polo players, like her teammate Colleen Wasson, who now find themselves without the possibility of playing one sport, but still being able to compete for the swim team.

"I'm not sure what I'm going to do. I don't want to transfer because of my major, and I wouldn't want to leave swimming, but I came here for polo. I was recruited for water polo," said Wasson. "It leaves me in a really difficult situation."

"It's really hard to believe that someone could take your dream, and everything you worked for, and just throw it out the window," Wasson added.



Nielsen summed up the feeling on being on an eliminated team that still has a season to finish.

"We're playing to prove it doesn't matter if we're out of state, or underfunded," Nielsen said. "We're shooting for the NCAA Championship, and we're mad. I think we'll kick some major butt."

Creationist theory should be taught as history

Debate is heated in the state of Ohio as the state school board questions whether or not to include the creationist theory in the science curriculum in the school system.

The new science curriculum is to be implemented by the end of the year and will effect Ohio's student population of 1.8 million. While teachers will not be forced to adhere to the new curriculum, the state's standardized tests will include material from the approved guidelines.

Those in favor of the "Intelligent Design" claim that it would be a good idea to teach for and against Darwin's theory allowing room for crediting the origin of species to God.

The individuals behind the movement feel that by allowing Intelligent Design to be taught in the classroom that all of the viewpoints on the subject will be represented equally.

While the argument remains that students should be allowed to experience all viewpoints and then make a decision for themselves as to how the world was created, there is a fine line to be drawn between teaching students science and teaching them religion.

While it may be a good idea to mention to students that evolution is not the sole viewpoint, it seems impossible to teach students creationist theory without making it a history lesson.

In a country where students of all different religions attend classes together, it would be difficult to teach a curriculum so historically entrenched in religion even from a scientific perspective. Many teachers in Ohio have come out against the idea strictly because the idea of a deity creating the world does not fall under the category of science but in that of religion.

Beyond which, separation of church and state prevents religion from being discussed in classes due to the fact that it could offend students that do not believe in a religious figure.

School is a place that is set up specifically to educate students on the ways of the world, all of them, however it is not a soapbox on which to preach specific ideas unrelated to education. It is especially not a place that is meant to make those with different beliefs, such as those that are atheist or agnostic, feel uncomfortable in the classroom.

In a country in which it is offensive to some to even have the word God in the Pledge of Allegiance the addition of the creationist theory for anything more than a history lesson just doesn't seem like a good idea.

Welcome to 'UMassic Park'

JAMIE BRYAN

In a surprising development yesterday, Massachusetts Commissioner Marcellette Williams announced yesterday that UMass's budget crisis "is over" thanks to an ingenious University plan to be implemented with immediate effect. Taking its inspiration Stephen Spielberg's box office smash, UMass is planning to rebrand itself as "UMassic Park," with the catchy slogan "Where Education Is History." It is hoped that the new amusement park will be one of the nation's most successful tourist months. UMass President William Bulger responded to the proposal by calling it "startling," saying, "This is such an obvious move for UMass, you have to ask why nobody thought of doing it before now. We've been searching for our focus for some time now, and it seems that we've found it at last. The term 'public education' has been bandied about by some extremists, but everybody knows that education has never been what we're about here. For goodness sake, what are we? A University?"

Within hours of the radical plan being released to the public, details of the park's star attractions began to emerge. The current administrative staff is to be relocated to the Mullins Center, and they are expected to provide hours of entertainment to an unsuspecting public as they go about their day-to-day work. The very best clowns will be picked to perform in the Fine Arts Center with the debut production rumored to be Shakespeare's comedy "As You Like It," thought to be in honor of acting Governor Jane Swift and her staff. A senior University official promised that some faculty members would also be offered new jobs as tour guides responsible for showing visitors around the park. Those responsible for the UMassic Park project believes former faculty would be ideally placed to tell visitors "what used to go on here before we turned things around."

Others will not be so lucky, however. Soundproof cages for "those amongst us who have no respect for authority," namely the dissenting faculty and students opposing the destruction of UMass, are already being built.

"The kids will love watching these animals," said an insider, adding that the attraction would be "UMassic Park's very own zoo." It will, however, be a zoo with a twist: every day, one of the ensnared members of faculty will be ritually sacrificed to the acting governor. Although somewhat controversial, it is expected that state legislators will "bend over back wards" to legalize such brutal entertainment.

Indeed, this is only one of the cost-cutting measures the management of UMassic Park will seek to implement.

A special committee will be established, dedicated to helping the state cut costs across Massachusetts, "as long as nobody complains about it too much."

"After all," said a spokesman, "I've percent of the State budget currently goes to education – although that's well below the national average of 12 percent, there's still some way to go until we can confidently declare Massachusetts's public education system dead and buried. Furthermore, there's an urgent need to build on the $2.4 billion worth of tax cuts we managed to achieve in the 1990's."

In order to appease any skeptical traditionalists, UMassic Park will continue to provide a limited education program, offering a specialized but top-level range of classes. Apparently, the Administration has recognized that it is "sitting on top of a gold mine" in terms of selling the "UMass experience" to those who want to learn. The classes on offer will include "The Merits of Defeatism," "Getting the Most Out of the World's Leading Democracy," and the tantalizing "How to Hammer Nails Into Your Own Coffin Whilst Simultaneously Lying Inside It." If this conjures up images of illusion and trickery, then it is perhaps fitting that UMassic Park's star educational facility will be its Circus School, where clowns from across the globe are expected to congregate.

However, there came a shocking response from the most unlikely of quarters last night, with acting Governor Swift reportedly "incensed" by UMass's plans. "In Swift's view, this proposal proves once and for all that the University's leaders are clearly out of their minds," according to a statement released to the media late yesterday. "UMass is openly plotting to destroy the public education system in Massachusetts. Everybody knows that this is the acting governor's job. She feels that UMass is cynically trying to steal her thunder, and you could go as far as to say that her job becomes obsolete once public institutions start doing it for her."

Meanwhile, beyond the borders of Massachusetts, the UMassic Park proposal seemed to have sparked frantic debate from which no one was exempted. In a hastily arranged live address to the nation, President George W. Bush said that, whilst UMassic Park had his "full support," American citizens should remain vigilant. He vowed that the US military would "do whatever it had to do" to win the ongoing war on public education, referring to those protesting budget cuts as "the terrorists on our doorstep."

At the same time, Disney executives privately admitted to being "petrified" of UMass's plans, conceding that even they "aren't capable of offering an experience as realistic and scary as this."

Jamie Bryan is a UMass exchange student.

An open letter to Robert Marcum

SAM WILKINSON

Dear Robert Marcum,
Athletic Director, UMass:

It's been a bad few days for you, Mr. Marcum. The basketball team blew it again. The women's basketball team was so close and then they blew it too. The hockey team hardly left a positive impression in anybody's mind.

Then Monday, you had a hand in the elimination of seven teams. It is estimated that the cuts will save $1.1 million in the next year. The 130 athletes losing scholarships won't be so good, but it's progress, especially in a state that so clearly doesn't care about its primary agent of higher education.

What else could you have done, really?

I write this letter to you not as an angry student, although I must certainly am. I also do not write it to you as an angry journalist, although I must certainly am that as well. I write this to you because you and I are quite similar in our roots – we're both from West Virginia.

That doesn't matter to people up here. Our beautiful home state is nothing but toothless hicks to a University that finds stereotypes abhorrent. Whereas Boston is the "hub of the Universe" as they like to call it, West Virginia is near Roanoke, right? You and I just don't share a common home state. We similarly share years of tradition, specifically a tradition that heats up in August and roars through December.

That tradition is football.

You're from Marshall. I must admit that I support West Virginia University. A few years ago, when the two schools played for the first time in a long while, Mountaineer Field sold out and almost witnessed a tremendous upset. The Mountaineers won of course – Marshall's defense wasn't quite ready for teams faster than they – and even though you are the AD at UMass, I think Marshall's loss tugged at you slightly. Admit it: you wanted to debut in Division I-A football and beat an established team, even one as middle-of-the-road as WVU. It didn't happen.

What did happen was Marshall romping its competition otherwise. A MAC title in its first season playing real football. Admit it: you were proud of the Herd. They were a I-AA school who went bigtime, and then they went big-time!

Why not here?

It was an easy thought to think. If Marshall, a private school in the West Virginia hills could do it (and that's just one more reason to be proud), certainly a decently funded state program like UMass could. Todd Bankhead, Marcel Shipp and Mark Whipple certainly didn't let you down, winning a I-AA championship just one year later. Now the possibility of the big-time is something you can't get out of your head.

If Marshall could make a dent on college football, so too could the Massachusetts Minutemen.

It's why that team wasn't cut Monday, isn't it? It isn't losing so much as a helmet, a ball, or, more expensively, a scholarship. Meanwhile, seven teams won't play next academic year because we can no longer "afford" them.

Campus critics had clearly been gunning for cuts to the football team.

The Faculty Senate suggested cuts to "the biggest athletic programs" and one can follow that it meant a program that offers 60 scholarships while losing almost $2.5 million per year. At an open forum, speakers wondered how, in a financial crisis, the University could afford a team losing such a vast amount of money. Nobody wanted to say it publicly – even the Collegian pulled up short on this – but the football team had to go.

Rather than make that cut, or face that criticism, you redirected cries to slash the Athletic Department's budget by eliminating seven teams who had done nothing but achieve measures of national success in most cases.

"You can have your million dollars," you said, "but this is where the million is coming from."

More importantly, you still have football. Why?

UMass is never going to be Marshall.

Massachusetts is never going to be West Virginia. Obvious enough, but on the issue of football, things couldn't be more different.

A few years ago, Matewan, a high school with no more than 200 students total, started five offensive linemen weighing more than 300 pounds for a Single-A playoff game against Clay-Battelle. Last season, UMass had two roster players who weighed in at more than 300 pounds.

Two years ago, University High School played my own alma mater, Morgantown High School; 20,000 fans showed up. That's more fans than have ever showed up at a UMass sporting event.

For God's sake, Mr. Marcum, Massachusetts biggest football games are played on Thanksgiving Day.

Massachusetts just isn't a football state. While the Super Bowl was great fun, on the ground floor, Massachusetts hardly flourishes. High school football is of secondary concern and New England's college football is a joke. Moving Massachusetts to I-A isn't going to change that. UMass is never going to compete in the same way that Marshall does because the community doesn't exist in the same way.

By now, you must surely know that the Pioneer Valley is a politicized area disinterested by football. Few attend UMass games and that is unlikely to change, regardless of a division jump or a new stadium. Football is a culture that the local community is both wholly disinterested in and, more often than not, disdainful of. In writing this letter, a colleague reacted with surprise at the notion that a high school game could draw 20,000.

Massachusetts can't be Marshall because, unlike West Virginia, the local community isn't interested in high caliber football. Even if it were, Marshall has a decade's worth of winning behind it to recruit with – UMass has one championship season already faded by time.

The fact is simple Mr. Marcum. We live in a community not interested in a football team unlikely to win big. For that simple reason, it is the football team that should have been cut.

You have the opportunity to make an Athletic Department that is highly successful without a football program to hold it back. It might have barely flown this year, but will $2.5 million losses continue to fly in the coming years? Radically redefining what your Athletic Department is – successful without a reliance on football – could have been your greatest achievement.

Instead, you seem destined to forever oversee a mediocre football team playing below-average teams before a few thousand bored fans. Rather than leave your stamp on Athletic Department approach everywhere, you've simply chosen to fall in line with other football hopeful ADs.

In ten years, when UMass football is still I-AA and the department has had to eliminate more teams, will it be worth it for you to say that you'd hoped we could have been Marshall? Especially when you could have been saying that we are something great?

Sincerely,
Sam Wilkinson

The return of 'Ask Pedro'

PEDRO GOMES

Dear Pedro,

I read your column from a few days ago and was wondering, the questions people send you, are they real or do you make them up?
Helena

Helena, if that is your "real" name, I take offense to your question. You assume that I would go out of my way and create these questions so I could easily segue into my own opinions and arguments on certain issues. Speaking of segueing, have you seen the new Segway traveling apparatus? Its two wheels and a bunch of gyroscopes...pure genius. Finally, we as Americans have finally come up with something stupid that's going to catch on fast before the Japanese did. Take that Japan, birthplace of karaoke, we've got two wheels and a bunch of gyroscopes.

I hope that answers your question. If um of my loyal readers have questions of their own that deal with "real" issues and want Pedro answers, then email me at pjgomes@student.umass.edu.

Dear Pedro,

The elections for next years SGA representatives are on their way and I was hoping you could give me insight on the possible candidates, and your initial response to their promises.
John

The possible candidates...this is going to be tough because I have only had a single encounter with perspective candidates. It happened just a few days ago, and it was a lovely interaction. I was sitting at the DC with some friends when off in the distance I hear the perspective candidate for either student trustee or president talking. It was a long-winded speech about signing his papers. I then thought to myself, "Please don't come over here. Please don't come over here."

"Hi! I'm Guy Christophson!" I couldn't remember his real name.

He then said something about living in Van Meter and his running mate hailing from Orchard Hill. Before he could get further in his speech I reacted with cat-like reflexes. Grabbing his papers, I signed them, knowing full well by signing quickly would get this nice fellow to leave my personal space as soon as possible. While I signed the paper he walked away. I was a little mad, because when telemarketers and MassPirg bother me, they at least stick around. With him gone though, I was able to turn to my friends and say, "The sooner you sign this, the sooner he'll leave us alone." They, in turn, did.

Guy walked back over and we handed him the papers. He said thank you and I, wanting to test him, said, "Best of luck next year!" knowing full well that the race would not be next year, but soon. Alas, my wishes fell on deaf ears because once he had gotten what he needed, he turned away, not really caring to get to know his voters. So if you read this Guy, I just want to wish you best of luck, and that you get my vote, as long as no one else runs against you.

Dear Pedro,

It's March and that means it's "Declare Your Major" month. I'm undecided right now and was wondering what you would recommend I choose.
Ted

I recommend you choose...another school. Just kidding with you Ted. I've got some good ideas for you though. With the recent budget cuts (an issue that seems to come up repeatedly in my column) I can give you some NEW majors that have recently been created to accommodate these cuts.

Astro-Eco-Nomy: one of the most requested of the new majors. Dealing with stars, planets and money! How can you go wrong with that? And at last, with a major like this, you can finally incorporate Uranus jokes when talking about the stock market. The pluses abound!

Psycho-Socio-Comm-Ology: Finally, the three majors that everyone wants has now been combined into one. If you thought it was hard to get into Communication classes last semester wait until this semester. Remember to tack on the Wo-Ger-Men's Studies minor.

And finally, my favorite new major: ARTS. Seeing as the arts ANYWHERE has always gotten the shaft the University has created a course that drives the shaft deeper. Combining theater, dance, music, and visual art into one lovely major so that a person's specific skills can never be honed and that they will leave the University with a mediocre understanding of every single art fonn, but not actually know enough to get a good job.

So Ted, I hope this helps you out, because I know that McDonalds sure can't wait for us to all graduate with these new majors. They've got a bunch of hamburger-heating microwaves waiting for us, and you can even hang your diploma on the Fryolator.

Dear Pedro,

This budget crisis is getting worse and worse and I really want to do something proactive in getting solutions. I was thinking of getting the kids to rally and protest but I saw that the UMass Child Care Center, with their remaining budget, already did that. So I was wondering, what else could I possibly do?
Gale

The kids already rallied? Sorry Gale, but now I have to really think of something to do, because that was going to be my coup de grace. Whoring the children for one last hoorah and bringing a tear to the eyes of our leaders. Hopefully their teachers have already made them write letters about how they'll truly miss naptime to their state representatives. And hopefully you, too, Gale have written to your state representative.

So here goes, a backup plan if the letters fail to do anything. Knowing our state representatives, they'll take it to heart and do something for the people, so this plan is almost unnecessary, but here goes anyway.

> "...the University has created a course that drives the shaft deeper. Combining theater, dance, music, and visual art into one lovely major so that a person's specific skills can never be honed."

Let's turn to acting Governor Jane Swift! She, as a working mom, must realize the hardship it is for a family to have a job, or be a student, with children. After all, we can't all get to our helicopters in time to be home for soccer practice. Sometimes you're just too busy with classes and state budgets to hop on board your helicopter and fly back home. Sometimes, even an acting Governor needs a Child Care Center in which to put her children.

So this is going out to you acting Governor Jane Swift, I know that you're busy with your own kids and you have a helicopter to go home and take care of them, but the helicopters of the families' here at UMass are all in the shop, so we could really use a little more money to keep child care going.

Or, better helicopter mechanics.

BEN KWELLER
Sha Sha
Big Hassle

It might seem strange that Ben Kweller's new album is being called a comeback, considering he's only 19-years-old. But he's been making music for nine years now, having first hit it big with his highly hyped Dallas band Radish back in 1993, when he was only 10-years-old. You'd think that since Kweller's practically grown up in the music business, by now he'd have learned a golden rule of songwriting: that a good pop song is more than the sum of its parts. But what he ends up showcasing on Sha Sha, for the most part, is a lot of good ideas that have turned into inconsequential fluff.

It's true that Kweller knows all the proper pop mechanics and he's constantly showing them off on Sha Sha. The album has tons of sunny country-rock guitar licks, earnest vocals and fun keyboard melodies, and you really want to like it. But the whole thing is just so damn frustrating to listen to, because you can feel that he's holding something back, that each song has the potential to be something bigger and better than it is. Some singers can say more with a "yeah, yeah!" or a "whoo, whoo!" than they can in a hundred words. But Kweller isn't one of them. Catchy hooks are way too easy to hide behind, and, when given the choice to show his face or cower behind a beautiful harmony, he takes the easy route almost every time.

The album starts off strong with the oddly interesting "How it Should Be" and the rocker "Wasted and Ready," both of which are as subtle and fun as the best Beulah song. But after bringing your hopes up, the album drags in lawsuit predictability until just around the end. The best song on the album, by far, is the simplest one; on "Lizzy," Kweller picks up a guitar while on the road and sings to his girlfriend back home. The song works because he doesn't try too hard and because he's not afraid to come out from behind his wall of rock and roll clichés. Overall, Sha Sha is a good blueprint for what's to come from Kweller when he figures out how to combine his rock knowledge with truly heartfelt songwriting. (Dan Catalinotto)

CARBON LEAF
Echo Echo
Self-Released

Though you probably never heard of indie band Carbon Leaf, chances are you may have been one of 20 million to see them. That's because Carbon Leaf was the first ever recipient of The New Music Award for best unsigned band, awarded during January's telecast of the American Music Awards. I can't readily tell you if they really are the best unsigned band currently out there, but judging from they're fourth self-released album, Echo Echo, I can tell you that are a pretty damn good unsigned band.

The members of Carbon Leaf call their music "Ether Electrified Porch Music" (the name of their third album, and no I don't know what it means either), but I regard it as electric/acoustic rock with elements of folk, bluegrass, Americana, pop and a large helping of Celtic influence. They play all the traditional rock band instruments like the guitar, bass and drums, but they just as often use mandolins (both acoustic and electric) and tin whistles. The music is energetic, atypical and often thrilling; the band probably has much fun playing it as one will listening to it. And, despite the confluence of disparate musical genres on the album, Carbon Leaf is never arty for the sake of being arty. Echo Echo is an accessible album that could be enjoyed by even the mainstream music fans.

Songs like "The Boxer" (which was played at the AMAs) and "Wanderin'" hop and skip like stones thrown across a pond. Barry Privetts' croaky voice compliments the lightness of the music, and the band's sense of melody and harmony is exceptional. They include songs like "Mary Mac" a bluegrass song with a punk attitude, with the band taking the usual settings of the music and cranking them up to a fever pitch. Echo Echo is airy and delightful, and could be played at easy-going backyard parties with no one Neanderthal knitting their brow and exclaiming, "what is this shit?"

But Carbon Leaf does have the tendency to sprawl; many of their songs extended to more then five minutes in length (the last track, "Maybe Today," is 10 minutes long and doesn't really get under way until the two minute mark). Sometimes they work this to their benefit, as on "Desperation Song," with its pounding chorus. Often though, they let the songs dribble on, weakening their impact. Their best songs are the ones that fly in at under four minutes. Carbon Leaf is also not quite adept at softer, more ballad-like songs. "Mellow Tone" is, as the name implies, mellow, but I can't tell you anything else; every time I tried listening to it, my mind drifted away.

Minogue helms new Aussie invasion

KYLIE MINOGUE
Fever
Capitol

The Aussie invasion isn't just sweeping Hollywood. Down Under star Kylie Minogue is poised to hit it big this year as she prepares to release Fever, a high-octane groove album, sure to take America by club-hopping storm.

You may remember Minogue's putrid version of "Loco-motion" back in the late 80s. That's right: 80s teen pop sensation Kylie Minogue has risen from the dead like a phoenix out of ashes, ready to continue the Aussie invasion that has so far dominated Tinseltown. Minogue is the pop comeback of the year.

Minogue didn't really just drop dead. She's been one of the world's biggest superstars for over a decade. In most of the world over—especially Britain—the word "Kylie" is an instantly recognizable name thanks to over 30 hit singles, 30 million records sold, and a popular presence in movies and television. Minogue can even count Madonna as one of her fans. The Queen of Pop wore a shirt studded with jewels that spelled out "Kylie Minogue" at the 2000 Europe Music Awards.

Infectious to the bone, "Can't Get You Out of My Head" is making sure that Minogue finalizes her international success as the single recently cracked the top 10 Billboard singles chart in the states. If you like "Can't Get You Out of My Head" (and I know there's more than just a few of you out there), then you'll love Fever.

A soothing voice drenched in party house rhythms, Fever can raise your temperature just as quickly as it can raise the roof. Exotic techno beats, "la la la" comparable refrains, and trance atmosphere vibes characterize every last song on the album. Fever kicks off with "More, More, More" and keeps the disco ball spinning for almost an hour.

Minogue coos her way through guilty-pleasure retro-dance grooves and every sound is a hook. Her vocals don't stretch across five octaves; but she certainly gets by on an abundance of charm and an ability to deliver infectious pop fruit. Cute, fun, slightly naughty, her music is an almost perfect reflection of her image.

The diva sings only about love – the same obsessive, if not plain old, lyrics about desire found on nearly every other pop record. But they're irresistible pop confections.

The album peaks with the title cut where Minogue decides to play doctor and asks her significant other "There ain't a surgeon like you any place in the world/ So now shall I remove my clothes." Is it hot in here, or is it just me?

Another standout track is "Burning Up," a dazzling and energetic song made up of fragmentary lyrics such as "Down to the disco/ Everything stops/ Walking in solo/ Everyone drops." This is a cutting edge house track that will ignite dancefloor fire.

By the end we're thanking Minogue chose to place a dozen tracks on the album. Since Minogue uses the same formula on every track the production is a bit too consistent.

She's no stranger to baring some skin either—have you seen the ever-popping scarf she dons in the video for the lead single?

This gal is on a roll, no doubt about it, and Minogue may be more about image than actual substance but that's part of the package that keeps us glued to the pop spectacle; she's set in motion—and Fever is packed with enough hits to keep the show rolling.

Better get the thermometer!

Pearce's cheekbones guest star

THE TIME MACHINE
Directed by Simon Wells
Starring Guy Pearce, Jeremy Irons and Samantha Mumba
Playing at CineMark 12, Hadley

Talk about nepotism. Simon Wells, the director of the new, earthbound adaptation of H.G. Wells' science fiction classic The Time Machine, happens to be the great-grandson of the beloved author. The young Wells is a former animation director this credits include the great The Prince of Egypt and the not-so-great Balto) making the great leap into live-action filmmaking, and he displays all the talent of a yeoman work-for-hire director. He's a competent helmer but he has precious little imagination or spark. I should be glad that Wells doesn't employ a jump cut every fifteen seconds, but I wished that a fantasy filled with special effects dazzle could be a little more...dazzling. H.G. Wells should be treated with more than literal-minded fussiness.

From what I heard, Wells hews close to the source material (I've never read the novel), but he's laughably serious when it comes to time travel. There's none of the cornball awe that a movie like Back to the Future brought to the subject, just banal philosophical observations that "the past cannot be changed." The science behind the movie is similarly suspect. Yes, I know this is a fantasy and I'm being a curmudgeon for questioning its validity, but it would've been nice to see the charge of developing and discovering a monumental new scientific achievement. But The Time Machine is remarkably hohum. When Guy Pearce, as the century-hopping scientist Alexander Hartdegen, climbs into his sleek brass machine, it carries all the excitement of...watching a guy sit in a sleek brass machine (it makes the loops conceits of Kate and Leopold look like works of theoretical genius.)

Hartdegen's not driven in his quest by a sense of discovery, but of romantic idealism: he wants to save his beloved Emma from dying. Now, I'm a sucker for romance, but Hartdegen's reasons are reductive and simplistic. Aren't there better things he could do with such a powerful ability? It reminds of Hollow Man when Kevin Bacon becomes invisible only to turn into a generic mad slasher – a high-tech Jason Voorhees.

Hartdegen's travels take him to the year 2030, where he meets Orlando Jones as a natterny holographic information unit, and then 800,000 years into the future after the moon has broken up and humanity is split into two races. The Eloi are peaceful, primitive, brown-skinned people who live above ground in what look like giant wicker baskets suspended on the side of a cliff. They're hunted by the cannibalistic Morlocks: ugly, humanoid creatures that live below ground and look like gray, hairless apes with skull faces. Hartdegen naturally falls for a pretty Eloi named Mara (Irish pop singer Samantha Mumba, in a bland acting debut) and makes it his mission to save the Eloi people (I'm not even going to get into some of the sociological implications the movie dumbly presents).

Pearce makes the mistake of thinking he's in a serious movie and gives a superlative, emotionally grounded performance. It's the kind of good acting that spins certain movies off balance. He could learn a few things from Jeremy Irons, sporting silvery albino makeup, who plays the Morlock leader with a curled-lip elegant haughtiness. However, after this and the dreadful Dungeons and Dragons, Irons should learn that you can't return to being the grand sir of British cinema by appearing in such silly, burnished junk food.

The Time Machine is a quaintly retro adventure fantasy potboiler. Wells doesn't suffocate the movie with smarmy film school hipness, but it's drably shot, with jungle sets that look like they came off a studio back lot, and proficient special effects that are too blah to be considered eye candy. There are glancingly "clever" references to the original novel and film version, but they just show how weak this tea is. The Time Machine is as limp and meaningless as pumped up, dumbed-down action extravaganzas like Tomb Raider and Swordfish.

And will someone, for heaven sakes, please feed Pearce. The actor is so hollow-cheeked, that it looks as though his cheekbones are trying to take over his face. It's not exactly transporting entertainment to watch an actor wither away his talent and handsomeness on a film with all the substance of a Happy Meal.

Grooves infest Pearl Street

PSYCHEDELICBREAKFAST
Pearl Street
March 8

Stepping into the downstairs of Pearl Street, Cold Duck Time's jazzed up instrumental version of "Hey Joe" careened through the sticky heavy air, and I inched my way through a packed house – far more eclectic than the dozens that witnessed them open for Addison Groove Project this past Wednesday. Anticipation escalated as Jesse Goldman pounded out smooth solos on the keyboard, and Joe Cordoza adds a strong rhythmic texture along with drummer Makaya McCraven (I must say, Cordoza's performance on bass was better appreciated by the Pearl Street crowd then those who witnessed him fumble through an uninspiring and banal protest speech Wednesday. Fortunately, he refrained from singing the official "Save UMass" protest song: "United we stand/ United we fall/ This is the worst protest song of them all..."). A vocal-less Platypus Complex (rare complex which apparently causes you to rap like the Beastie Boys) added some dynamics to the instrumentation. The interpolation of jazz and rap worked well and the crowd acted up like ravenous hawks.

Psychic B? The band hailing from East Haven, Conn. has picked up some steam since their conception in '98, and has a rather large and loyal following in this area. Psychedelic Breakfast established quite a reputation sharing the stage with such greats as Robbs Krieger, Deep Banana Blackout, Max Creek and other notable performers. Combining sounds and rhythms from funk, jazz, rock and psychedelia, jamming the band thrills crowds with amazing and virtually self-taught skill, fun lyrics, and live improvisation.

The band opened up with an instrumental number highlighted by Tim Palmieri's guitar lead. The rhythm section consists of Jordan Giangarco on keyboard, Adrian Tromantano pounding out the percussion, and Ron Spears on electric bass. The typical Psychic B song is multi-sectional and very dynamic in nature with easily discernible changes in tempo, intensity and rhythm over its duration. Short verses are sung by either Palmieri or are harmonized by Giangarco and Spears. The sections marked by intense jamming are extremely impressive and I advise the reader to hear for his or herself, as any of my words would fail to do the music justice.

Though the music itself was enough to keep those in attendance thrilled, Palmieri played to the crowd throughout the show. Before one song, he introduced a segment called "food for thought." During this rap with the audience he asked, "Who likes marijuana? Smoke it now!" The crowd cheered as a sweet scent swept through the venue.

After a short intermission, which saw Tromantano deliver a drum solo, the band performed a cover of The Doors' "Peace Frog" to the delight of the mass. The song was followed by a psychedelic jam that captivated the capacity crowd. The encore saw a fun and improvised tune about black and tans, with Tromantano adding in solos on the harp. Palmieri blessed the makers and importers of Guinness at its conclusion.

This talented band did on Friday night what it has been doing for the past three years. The concert was filled with great music performed by talented young artists. Psychedelic Breakfast has fun up on that stage and their enthusiasm carries over to the crowd. I urge any readers who have yet to experience Psychic B live to do so the next time they come around.

The problems that Carbon Leaf has on Echo Echo are easily outbalanced by the moments that shine. The album is surprisingly polished effort for a self-released indie and the music is quite enjoyable. Perhaps, because of the award, you'll be hearing Carbon Leaf on the Top 40 countdown. It'll be deservingly so. (Johnny Donaldson)

DAKOTA MOON
A Place To Land
Elektra

Dakota Moon's CD A Place To Land represents an interesting attempt to hybridize acoustic soul with some light rock. For the most part the band succeeds at their experiment. The album is melodic and enjoyable, supported by rhythms that are both laid back and aggressive and strong vocals from the four guys who make up the band – Ray, Ty, Malloy and Joe. However, the album on a whole suffers from some forgettable songs and generic lyrics.

The best songs come at the beginning. The single "Looking For a Place To Land" has smoky verses that stretch out into soaring choruses. The song has a vaguely roots rock sound to it (though I wouldn't pair it with Cracker or Train) and stop and go guitars that compliment the vocals. However, lyrics about "looking for a brand new day" and little stories about a woman who finds her husband in bed with sister are pure blandsville.

Thankfully the music is strong enough that one can overlook the flawed writing. "Keeps Me Comin' (Addiction)" is yet another song with a Latin vibe, but the startling, potent vocals give it a charge the song comes off sounding like 98 Degrees' "Give Me Just One Night" with more testosterone. But the moaning of the song, equating a bad girl with drugs (it's true, has been heard before), Dakota Moon totally rocks out on track four "Don't Give Up On Me" which sounds like Jonny Kranz stripped of his look, veiled in blatant derivativeness. After the fifth track, "A Place To Land" goes south turning into dull filler until the last song, titled "My Song." It's a pure inspirational R&B number a la "I Believe I Can Fly" complete with a gospel choir and violins. The song flies pretty well, held down by only you guessed it, trite lyrics.

Dakota Moon's strength – lie in their voices (all four guys sing, so it's difficult to tell who is the lead vocalist on any particular sound) and their musical craftsmanship. Their Achilles' heal is their banal lyricism and inability to keep the energy for the length of the album. Maybe they need to pick up a dictionary and thesaurus to learn some new words or stop writing songs from the book. Dakota Moon is satisfactory, but there's room for improvement. (Johnny Donaldson)

TRIK TURNER
Trik Turner
RCA

This is what happens when you are in the Campus Center Basement in the wee hours of the morning. Your mind starts playing tricks on you, and you use music to dispel the quiet. So you head on over the Arts desk and see if they have anything lying around.

Hence, Trik Turner.

This hard rock-influenced hip-hop – a loose definition of hip hop – group sounds a lot like every other rock/rap fusion group being played on the radio. Except these six guys are actually pretty good. Their self-titled debut album has some definite gems on it, as well as some tracks whose lyrics actually point to a lot of pain and anger that other bands have to fake. If Trik Turner is faking it on "Father," they're doing a damn good job of it. With disturbing lyrics like "Before you die, open your eyes/ And see all the different ways you neglected me/ You may have gave me life but you never gave me hope/ I don't ever want to take after my own father," Trik Turner not only provides some really great angry music, but also vents a lot of pent up frustration over the singer's relationship with his father.

"Friends and Family" seems to be the single track, the one getting limited airplay now, but will surely hit once more stations get it. It starts with vocalizations and a beat machine. It's slower and more reflective than the rest of the album, which is overall a quality first effort. You can tell where these guys are coming from – there are funk elements and turntables here and there, as well as loud guitars and tight lyrics. It's not Snoop and the Hollies homages.

This is a good album for a rainy, gray day, when you want some loud music to fit your mood. Trik Turner has talent. Their first disc shows that. While it is unlikely – though not impossible – that "Friends and Family" will knock off the pop-rap fusion that currently rules the charts, it is likely that Trik Turner will get a lot of play on stations that feature Limp Bizkit, Linkin Park and other bands of that genre. But Trik Turner isn't a copycat band, jumping up on the fusion wagon. Trik Turner is rock-influenced hip-hop, but it's original, with sometimes-deep lyrics and always-smooth beats that'll keep you awake while writing a 10-page paper in the Campus Center Basement. NASCAR continues to win fans

Like the asphalt at Talladega on a sunny August afternoon, the NASCAR season is heating up fast. This season has been an exciting and entertaining one for fans and non-fans alike, for many different reasons across the board.

If one thing has been more glaring than anything else, it has been that the Fox network will always have the supreme coverage when it comes to racing.

The trio of Mike Joy, Darrell Waltrip and Larry McReynolds greatly overshadow any member of the NBC team that covered the Daytona 500. Those three provide so much insight and education for fans who are just latching on to the sport, but will not shy away from getting technical in their analysis.

But the most obvious thing that the Fox crew brings to the table is its jocular relationship with its viewers. Waltrip is NASCAR's version of W.C. Fields, ready to hit fans with a zinger in every situation and not afraid to assault his cohorts with some friendly ribbing. He is the best thing to happen to NASCAR in quite some time, as the sport is prospering under Fox's coverage. Unfortunately, coverage will be turned back over to NBC, TNT and TBS come midseason, which takes away from the excitement of the stretch run of the Winston Cup season.

But in order to keep its new public interested, Mike Helton and co. will have to make a clear-cut decision on the red flag controversies of the first few races of the season. At Daytona, officials decided to red flag the race with three laps left so that the race could be finished under green flag conditions. Then, just one week later at Rockingham, the race could have been put under a red flag, but instead Matt Kenseth won the race under caution.

These inconsistencies are bad for all the drivers of the motorsport (especially Darling Marlin, who was harmed by both decisions – he was on the point when Daytona went red and in second when the white and yellow flags flew at the Rock), but more so for the potential fans of the sport. What is a fan to think when they see the exact same situation in back-to-back weeks but see them resolved in completely contradicting manners?

One thing that is fantastic for NASCAR's popularity is the diversity of the drivers who are finding success in the early going of the 2002 season. Marlin leads the points race, and is one of the old school of racing. Even more telling is that Marlin drives for Dodge racing, which has seen an inordinate amount of success in the early going. Ward Burton, a fellow Dodge racer, was tremendously strong in the closing laps of the Great American Race, and sits in third place after four races.

Sitting in the second position of the points race is Ryan Newman, a cocky kid from the short tracks of Indiana. (Sound familiar? Maybe a little like an Indiana kid who shot on to the scene in 1993 and is most likely to top Dale Earnhardt and Richard Petty for most championships ever?) Newman is a flashy driver who turned more than a few heads when he took over the No. 12 ride from Jeremy Mayfield in the offseason. His three Top 10s in four races are behind only Marlin's four.

One thing that has taken away from the 2002 season has been the absence of Chevy from the top of the leaderboard. Dodge has won two races, Ford one and Pontiac one. Chevy's top finish? Dale Jr.'s second at Atlanta last week. Before that it was Michael Waltrip's fifth at Daytona. Chevy has only three top fives in four races this year and its top racer is rookie Jimmie Johnson, who sits just ahead of teammate Jeff Gordon in 10th place. NASCAR needs to make sure that this balancing continues in the following weeks. Chevy has been one of the leading manufacturers for years – a change isn't a bad thing, but the lack of success has been ridiculous for Chevy so far.

Now looking ahead to the so-called "Lady in Black" – Darlington, the track that's too tough to tame. Steve Park makes his triumphant return behind the wheel of the Pennzoil No. 1 car this weekend, his first start since a freakish crash there six months ago. He's the sentimental favorite to win there this weekend.

Brady's pick: Kevin Harvick. He's due for a big race in a struggling 2002, and Chevy will more than likely take its first win of the season this weekend.

Florida center could start tourney on bench

By Joel Kaiman
Independent Florida Alligator (U. Florida)

(U-WIRE) GAINESVILLE, Fla. – In the Florida men's basketball team's NCAA Tournament game against Creighton, center Udonis Haslem might get to watch something he has not had the opportunity to watch all season – the tip off.

Coach Billy Donovan said he is considering not starting Haslem, who has started all 30 game this season, to help keep him out of foul trouble.

In the Gators' Southeastern Conference Tournament loss to Mississippi State, Haslem, a first-team All-SEC player, sat on the bench for 17 minutes of the first half after picking up two quick fouls.

A repeat of that could leave the Gators exiting the Tournament early, Donovan said.

"Udonis is going to have to play and be able to stay on the floor," Donovan said. "He's going to have to be able to use good judgment based on how the game is being officiated."

If Haslem is sitting on the bench to start the game, he can observe how the game is being called without picking up any fouls himself.

Donovan said not starting Haslem is still a possibility though, and he is leaning toward starting him because as a senior it will be Haslem's last NCAA Tournament.

"It may be that we start him and that if he picks up one foul we take him out of the game immediately and then have him sit there and watch to let him see what's going on," Donovan said.

Either way, the message to Haslem is clear. Stay out of foul trouble.

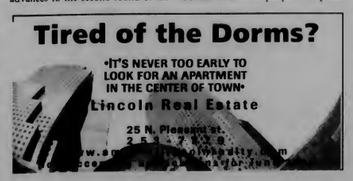
Because it is the NCAA Tournament and the officials probably will be new to both teams, getting used to how the game is being officiated will be an important factor in determining the outcome.

"I think that for every team in the first round, the officiating is going to be a little bit different than what they're used to," Donovan said.

NOT SO NEUTRAL: If UF advances to the second round of the NCAA Tournament, the game will be recorded on paper as a neutral site game.

If the game is against Illinois, in reality, it won't be.

Because of a new system where the NCAA selection committee attempts to place top seeds closer to home, several teams will have crowds similar to those of a home game.



Maryland will play in Washington D.C., Pittsburgh will play in Pittsburgh and Southern California will play in Sacramento, Calif.

"If there is a matchup in the second round game against [Illinois], certainly the advantage goes to them because it would be like a home court for them," Donovan said.

BONNER'S BEST BET: It doesn't matter to forward Matt Bonner that some people filling out their brackets are picking UF as the No. 5 seed to get upset by a No. 12 seed this season.

The business administration major doesn't think it's the best investment, however.

"If they want to lose their money, let them lose their money," Bonner said.

Catamounts migrate south to Amherst

By Matthew F. Sacco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Final Four-bound SBU attempts to corral more loose balls for the men's lax team when Vermont comes to Garber Field this afternoon at 3:30.

Last season, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team got used to being the hunter. After going a paltry 10-16 in the two years prior, the Minutemen crushed victim after victim en route to a 12-2 record.

Opponents were as helpless as a deer in headlights when UMass' offensive juggernaut came rolling into town. And the Minuteman defense garnered the reputation as the most physical in college lacrosse. By the end of last season, there was an unknown fear that tingled in the spine of each UMass opponent – not so much this year.

"They are not going to be intimidated by playing a UMass," head coach Greg Cannella said of Vermont, this afternoon's opponent.

"They are young but they're a scrapps team."

The Minutemen enjoyed their role as underdog last year and even though they were the favorite in the last meeting with the Catamounts, they weren't expected to be as dominant in a 17-8 victory. The situation has reversed itself this year and although UMass is still the favorite, it is expected to blow the Mounts out of the water. But that isn't something UVM is ready to concede.

"They are in an easy position as the underdog," Cannella said. Indeed an easy position for Vermont and a dangerous one for UMass. A blowout win will do nothing but stabilize UMass' current No. 13 ranking, but a loss or even a close victory would likely drop it deeper in the polls – something it cannot afford if an at-large bid is still in the cards.

Realistically, this should be a case of the meat being thrown to the lions, but with the parody that has reared its ugly head in college lacrosse this season, who knows what could happen.

In all likelihood the more talented team will prevail and as far as overall skill is concerned, the Minutemen have a decided edge.

The key to the game will be how UMass responds when UVM attempts to slow the game down early, as it undoubtedly will. It has likely watched tape of the Stony Brook game in which an under talented Seawolves squad kept stride with the Minutemen by eating up clock on offense and therefore lagging the pace of the game.

Eventually UMass used a fourth quarter run to seal an 8-7 victory, but if you play enough close games with underdogs, you are bound to lose one. The Minutemen will not want to take that chance again. In order to avoid falling into that trap, an early lead is necessary. And the way to get that early lead is to shoot the ball and shoot the ball well.

Against SBU, the Minutemen missed the cage early and often.

"We had 15 shots in the first quarter and no goals," Cannella said.

UMass actually ended the half with over thirty shots and only one goal. The Maroon and White seemed to remedy that problem with nine goals in the first half against Navy, but the Mids didn't exactly play lax's version of the slowdown offense.

Vermont, on the other hand, will attempt to force its style upon the Minutemen with the perception that you can't score unless you have the ball. Obviously this can be made a moot point if UMass plays an aggressive takeaway defense and wins face-offs. But as long as Vermont controls the ball, it will be in the game.

When UMass does get the ball, the key will be in the offensive midfield. Kevin Leveille, Jeff Zwicki, Chris Fiore and company need to duplicate their outstanding effort against Navy.

The offensive middies accounted for six goals and 12 points in the 15-10 victory and they won't have nearly as talented a defense to face against the Catamounts. Chances are they'll have their way.

If so, this afternoon should be a cakewalk for the Minutemen.

Knicks continue downward slide

In two years of attending school in Massachusetts, I have come to realize that Boston sports fans seem to actually hate New York teams more than they love their hometown teams. It's hard to say if it's out of jealousy or if it's a constant bitterness over a foolish trade their baseball club made about 82 years ago for some pudgy guy who went on to hit 714 home runs in his career.

There is one fact though Boston sport junkies unconditionally love to see New York lose – as seen in the southwest riots following the 2001 World Series.

Well, Boston sports fans are smiling once again as one of the most successful franchises in the Big Apple is slowly spinning into a downward spiral.

For the last fifteen years, the New York Knickerbockers have enjoyed basketball supremacy (minus that all-elusive championship).

In the past, the Knicks have constructed teams that had so little talent but an infinite amount of heart to make sure basketball fans in New York always had something to be proud of in late May. The after school fights with the Miami Heat, the verbal quarrelling with a talking toothpick that wears a Indiana Pacers jersey or the constant struggle to dethrone the dynasty in Chicago always produced exciting moments in the extended Knicks playoff runs of the nineties.

However, the excitement has dismissed. Knicks fans, like myself, are going through a state of denial because it just isn't the same anymore.

The hatred between Miami and New York has become as dull as a butter knife. Reggie has no time to fight with Spike Lee; he is too busy trading blows with Kobe Bryant. And Michael Jordan plays for the Wizards now, not the Chicago Bulls.

Oh yeah there is one other important detail.

As of yesterday's standings, the Knicks are in last place in the Atlantic Division and with a 23-38 mark only Atlanta, Cleveland and Chicago have worse records in the Eastern Conference. Fighting to grasp a postseason birth will be a tough battle as they are 6 1/2 games behind the Charlotte Hornets for the eighth and final playoff spot.

Things are not looking to get any better at the moment either.

Marcus Camby has been out since Feb. 2 with a torn hip muscle and he is expected to miss the rest of the season.

Latrell Sprewell apparently the star of this team, is unhappy with the new head coach Don Chaney. Like most of the Knicks faithful, he is unhappy with his coaching style because it has not produced wins. Chaney has navigated the Knicks into NBA futility with a 12-29 record since taking over for the man who jumped off the rocks ship, Jeff Van Gundy.

Apparently though, Knicks management is not unhappy with Chaney's efforts as they awarded him for a job badly done with a one-year contract extension last week.

In 2000, Cablevision (the corporation that owns the Knicks organization) turned over the general manager duties to Scott Layden – son of the great basketball mind Frank Layden.

The younger Layden has made more blunders with this organization than Count Dracula could even begin to count. Possibly the worse decision he has made was signing an average two-guard to a ridiculously above-average contract.

Over the summer, Allan Houston robbed the Knicks organization and its fans of their money when he signed a $120 million contract to stay with New York. These fantastic financial numbers are supposed to be for the fantastic players... not for guys who are struggling to average 20 points per game on a terrible team.

Front-office moves should not be the scapegoat for the losing though.

The heart of this team does not exist anymore and it is just pathetic to watch.

Patrick Ewing bumping chests with John Starks and Charles Oakley after dunking home the game winning shot in game seven of the 1994 Eastern Conference finals seems like it occurred in another century.

Those kinds of moments won't happen again for a long time.

However, apparently there is some light at the end of the tunnel.

According to the NY Post, "Magic" Johnson has confirmed that he would love the opportunity to become the Knicks general manager.

Maybe the only thing that can save the fall of this franchise is a little magic.

Colonials conquer men's tennis; UMass drops another 7-0 match

By Elena Panesis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At the beginning of the season the future of the Massachusetts men's tennis program looked promising, finishing second only to St. Bonaventure in the Atlantic 10 tournament in 2000-2001. With talented freshmen Reid Stubbs and Scott Sans-Leeb onboard and with a few highly scouted recruits for next season, the squad considered this spring season a rebuilding year with improvements and hard work as its driving force rather than wins.

However, in an unexpected blow last week, it realized that this year would be its last as budget cuts have extended to athletics, including coach Judy Dixon's men's tennis team.

At 0-9 thus far in the still young spring season, the Minutemen have not had much to smile about and the elimination of the program has only put a damper on last year's success. Yet, the Minutemen must continue to battle it out for seniors like No. 1 Steve Prisco and Wisconsin native Todd Champeau, who deserve a successful ending to their long careers at UMass.

Moreover, Sans-Leeb and Stubbs plan to transfer to other schools with thriving tennis programs for next fall and desperately need wins to up their chances.

"It's tough for the guys knowing that the team is done," said assistant coach Scott Wilkins. "Yet on the other hand, Reid and Scott feel a lot of pressure knowing they have to transfer. But Judy's been saying this all season – we're over-scheduled."

Saturday, however, the Maroon and White did not fall 0-7 against George Washington due to over scheduling, as the squad plays this conference rival on a yearly basis. In fact, the Colonials are one of the most touted teams in the Atlantic 10 this season with four scholarships, including sophomore star Matt Hane at No. 1 and the Wright brothers from Florida at No. 2 and 5.

On paper the loss looked dismal, but some positives resulted from the match that will possibly carry over to other conference battles. In doubles play, the tandem of Sans-Leeb and Eric Rehlin breezed past Matt Treadgold/Kevin Wright in an 8-3 pro-set.

"No. 2 doubles could be a positive spark," said Wilkins. "They moved well and played as a team. You don't always get that from Eric. However, he got killed in singles. You would think his play would carry over but it didn't."

Singles highlights included another stellar performance from the team's leader Prisco, who despite a series of injuries from back problems to vertigo to pulled muscles, just came up short to fierce competitor Hane 6-3, 6-7, 6-3 in an emotional contest.

"Steve's been playing well but he's been playing tough opponents," said Wilkins. "He hurt his groin in the Dartmouth match and his injuries have been a setback. But his play has been quality and had he not suffered those setbacks, I think he could have won all of his last three matches."

The scoreboard has not accurately reflected the recent showings of Sans-Leeb or Champeau either, despite their recent losses to challenging opposition.

"Scott and Todd are on the cusp of turning around and have the most promise, setting Steve aside," said Wilkins. "Todd has played well. He hasn't broken through but he's been playing well all year. Scott has have lost 6-2, 6-3 but I was on the court with him and it was a lot closer than that score indicates. It was really a matter of a few points."

In only a few short days, the Maroon and White will embark on its annual Florida spring break trip to battle some of the top teams in the nation, including Lynn University, Stetson, Jacksonville University and the University of North Florida.

"Even teams you have never heard of are tremendous in Florida," said Wilkins. "Our goal is to practice a little more and get some outdoor play. Jacksonville might be our best shot to win but we're probably in over our heads."

However, the team's main objective is to play quality matches and make improvements for its upcoming A-10 bouts with schools like Dayton, Xavier and Fordham, which will determine conference seeding.

"I expect Steve to be ready to go but Todd and Scott are on the brink of winning," said Wilkins. "If they win a match against a top team and get some confidence, it could turn the whole season around."

Worshipping ZooMass

UMassDrunks tap party spirit

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Pomeroy brothers have a singular mission to inspire a new generation of socially courageous, outgoing, party-loving ZooMassonians. Their notorious Web site UMassDrunks.com celebrated its first birthday this past Sunday. Amazingly, without advertisement and based solely on the power of word of mouth, it has seen 100,000 hits in its first year.

Chris and Dave Pomeroy are representatives for the students who see college not only as an academic experience, but also as a lesson in life and how to have fun. They challenge the idea that the reputation of UMass as a party school cannot coincide with a reputation of academic integrity and strength. It is this vision that fuels the history of their Web site.

One day in the fall of his first semester, sophomore Computer Engineer major Dave Pomeroy, announced, "I want to start something really big," recalls his brother Chris, a junior B.D.I.C major. Thus the creation of UmassDrunks.com began. If you read the Web site's newly added section, "History," the Pomeroys' retell the storyline of the section that brought them to create the site.

"A guy walked into a dormitory lounge just before midnight looking for some action. The spectacle that unfolded before him would have made any mild-mannered soul lose their faith in the youth of America. Five individuals were sitting on the floor with no shoes, were up to no good. They were all sitting there on a Saturday night in a college form playing Risk. Yes, Risk. Risk, as in the board game," wrote Chris.

This "spectacle" is an example of what the brothers began to see on numerous Saturday evenings on campus and what depressed them to such depths that they took on the challenge of creating UMassDrunks.com.

Over their winter break, the brothers began the work on their mission to bring ZooMass back to UMass. The Web site they created was at first held on a server that only allowed three people at a time to visit the site. The project quickly took on momentum as friends told friends, who told friends who told people they knew, who told people nobody cared about, who gave out the news to anyone they could get to listen. The brother's mission had begun, their vision born, their journey begun.

"It has a big base. We just sat there and saw it explode," said Chris, to which Dave added sardonically, "...on a server that would only allow three people on at once."

It is not that the Pomeroy brothers dislike the social scene at UMass. It was part of the draw of the school for each of them, but they both agree that the once notorious party school has seen better days.

"I believe the social scene here is going down," said Chris, to which Dave added, "at a steep grade."

In an essay that Chris wrote over winter break and posted as "History," he expresses the views and opinions that drive their Web site.

The brothers' strongest theory behind why UMass is experiencing a social slump is that the school's reputation precedes itself so much so that students and visitors expect parties to just be here. Dave and Chris explained that in order for there to be parties students have to be willing to throw these parties. Instead they claim to repeatedly witness students sitting in their rooms waiting for the party to come to them, or for a party to be thrown. The idea of a party school, they said, is that everyone wants to party, throw a party, and act like the hooligans that make parties legendary. The Pomeroy brothers want students to take initiative and throw their own parties, and they say their Web site's goal is to inspire that initiative.

Chris and Dave believe that the changing acceptance demographics are negatively influencing social trends.

"As UMass is getting to be a more prestigious school, there are less kids from Massachusetts and New England, and more younger kids," said Dave.

Winscan server opens up channels at UMass

PC users connected to the University of Massachusetts network have a new tool these days with which to share files and information. "Winscan" launched by freshman Computer Science major Dan Dumont is connecting UMass computers through a file sharing system separate from the University operated OIT program.

Dumont's server was up and running at the end of last semester but mainly for testing. This semester the server is up and running, and available to all Windows users on campus.

To access the program interested students should follow directions laid out at the UMass Winscan Web site: www.canofsleep.com/winscan.

Thus far the site has seen 826 unique users, and has around 100 of those users sharing files. The database of files that can be shared through computers is updated every hour. Dumont points out that it is useful to know that you do not need the client to search and download files; you can use the Web site. Once you do search for files you give the server permission to search your computer for any files you have identified as public and that therefore can be shared.

If you have files designated as public they will be shared through the Winscan server. Those interested in working with Dumont to allow Mac users to do the same are welcome to contact him through the Web site, but at current he is not familiar enough with Macs to do it on his own.

Dumont developed the program with a friend who is running a similar program at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute. They have worked together, via the Internet, to work out the quirks of their programs. However, users having trouble with the system should seek help on the Message Board located on the website.

The purpose of the server is to decrease traffic over the Internet connection, since the server allows users to share on a program that uses less bandwidth than programs like Morpheus or Napster. Decreased Internet traffic will speed up Internet access time and the speed at which people can play games online, making the Internet more friendly to all users.

"It's a great program! It's something that should be built into Windows. I can't believe he did it," said Dave Miller a senior Computer Science major when asked if he had used the server.

"The cost of this 'prestige' is that the potential UMass applicant, a well-rounded high school student, above average in academics, the one who grew up in a blue-collar family in a blue collar Massachusetts town, the one with a solid work ethic, embracing a work-hard-play-hard mentality, is getting the shaft. These students are getting replaced by more 'prestigious' students," explained Chris in his essay. "The new UMass student is not coming from a blue-collar town; many aren't even coming from Massachusetts. They're students who're often shipped here from out of state 'prestigious' high schools by 'prestigious parents'...these kids went to school focusing so intently on grades that they forgot to do the normal stuff normal kids do like get a hobby or socialize with other people."

By younger, Chris and Dave mean students who have come from more economically stable and educationally driven communities that tend to shelter their youth more than the typical blue collar neighborhoods that built UMass.

Schools' reputations, like those of corporations or even celebrities, run in cycles. If UMass is currently in a downswing, there is still the hope that an upswing will revitalize our campus social scene soon enough. Chris explained that the administration's treatment of students often, especially at UMass, plays a large role in this cycle. A stern administration will create an atmosphere of risk, and excitement, where things happen and people get caught. When peoples' need to party peaks, they will revolt, causing madness to ensue. Then once again, the administration will begin to crack down, and the cycle of social upswings and downswings restarts.

Dave and Chris view the site as a "gallery" of sorts.

"It's pretty self-sufficient because people supply most of the material," said Dave.

Living in Butterfield before its conversion to a learning community, Chris had plenty of stories and pictures with which to begin the site. He went from room to room asking his friends for pictures.

The brothers say that although you would think there are plenty of pictures out there that would easily qualify for the site, not many make the cut. People submit pictures that are hilarious to their group of friends but may not make sense to others outside their group. The brothers agree that Chris is more lenient when it comes to what he would put on the page, but since Dave has the final say, the content remains strictly chosen.

"We really do go for quality over quantity," said Dave.

Obviously the question arises as to who gives permission for these individual's pictures (often embarrassing, not to mention incriminating) to be posted on the Internet. Dave explained that they assume that the person submitting the photograph has gotten permission from his or her friends to submit their picture. If Dave receives a request from someone whose picture is posted on the Web and they do not want it there, he will take the image down as quickly as possible.

Although the Web site's dominant feature is pictorials of drunkenness, the site does include a myriad of other useful games, such as power hour, "Simpsons Drink Along," stories, a Blood Alcohol Calculator, buddy icons, links to alternative spring breaks, a sound board, and the newly added "You got busted."

"You got busted" is a part of the site designated to explaining to students the school rules and laws involved when they are caught drinking or with drugs, and how to handle the situation to their best advantage.

"It's to help kids not get in more trouble than they're already in," said Chris.

The brothers view their work as a business of sorts and work hard to maintain the integrity of the site. If someone has an opinion to voice about the site or a part of the site they always welcome intelligent, constructive criticism and comments. They do not, however, usually, appreciate angry drunken emails.

"We want to be a reputable organization," said Chris. "We welcome all intelligent comments, and will always address them back."

Chris and Dave seek advice on a regular basis from UMass Student Legal Services in order to maintain their integrity as a private domain, not affiliated with the University. They have come to expect issues of legality with every new link and page they add to the site.

Thus far, the brothers have yet to receive any formal response from the administration. They did hear rumors last year, when the site was born, of chancellors and deans sending e-mails back and forth concerning the site, but have not received any confirmation or this.

Although there has been no response from the administration, students here and at other schools have taken notice. Spin-offs of the Pomeroys' Web site have been developed. UMass Dartmouth has its own version of the site, drunk-enough.com, as did Providence College before the administration shut down the site.

Drunk-enough.com is different from UMassDrunks.com in form and concept, mainly comprised of comments, stories, and advice on such things as "Get the Girl," and has very few pictures. The Pomeroy brothers have exchanged links with the Webmaster at drunk-enough.com but have had no other contact.

Beyond the AOL Instant Messenger buddy icons, there is no official UMassDrunks.com merchandise for sale. The Pomeroys' have considered the idea but have found that there are too many legal issues involved for them to even begin thinking about it. However, each brother can be seen on occasion sporting his own UMassDrunks.com T-shirt, as can a few of their select friends.

As far as UMassDrunks.com's future is concerned, Chris and Dave would like to keep the site running as long as they are students at UMass. However, they have yet to come to a conclusion as to how and if to continue the site after graduation or whom to pass it onto upon their retirements.

Chris and Dave are responsible for every part of UMassDrunks.com, as they are the only two who run the Web site. Though, they say they would like to thank their friends for making the site not only better but also the parties better and the social scene more enjoyable.

As UMassdrunks.com becomes more and more popular, will more students be tempted to break their studious habits and invite their peers to join them for a resident assistant-bashing, beer-pong-competing, music-blasting night? Or will the site merely allow those with little or no social life to enjoy someone else's? Will it inspire people to leave their rooms, or only give them another reason to spend Saturday night glued to their beloved monitor? Only time will tell if the legend of ZooMass can relive its glory days. Meanwhile, the Pomeroy brothers are having enough fun for all of us.

Prashad engages in conversation on race

By Rachel Smith
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Dr. Vijay Prashad, Director of the International Studies Program at Trinity College in Connecticut, discussed race with University of Massachusetts students and faculty at the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union last week. Dr. Prashad has written several books dealing with racism and society including The Karma of Brown Folk and Everybody was Kung Fu Fighting.

Dr. Prashad is an American born in Calcutta, India. He interspersed personal encounters with racism into broader notions for radical social reconstruction in his lecture that lasted just over one hour. Prashad held a one-hour "conversation" with his audience after he ended the lecture.

"I like having conversations about race that are not touchy-feely conversations about how everybody should be nice to everybody," Prashad said. "I think we need to have conversations about race which are about poverty-which are about the lack of dynamic in the antiracist struggle against global inequality."

The office of Asian, Latino, African and Native American Affairs (ALANA) cosponsored Dr. Prashad's lecture along with the South Asian Student Organization and the Distinguished Visitors' Program.

"After being exposed to Vijay's work last semester I was totally inspired by his work," said Sonny Suchdev, Assistant Program Coordinator for the Office of ALANA affairs. "I really felt that a broader audience needed to hear him."

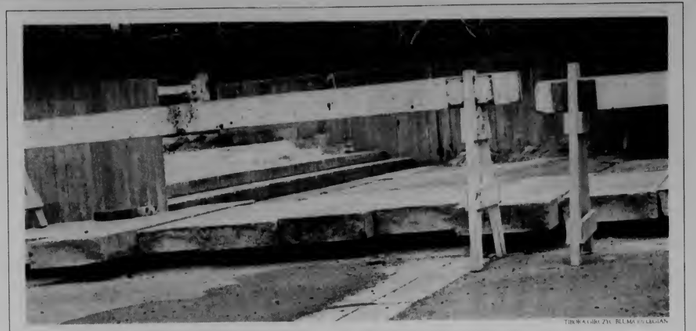
"My goal was to bring someone who's an extremely intelligent critical thinker and a really committed activist to talk about issues of social justice. I really wanted to get people thinking about particularly about issues of race how they connect to other issues of oppression," Suchdev went on. "The goal was met you could say."

Students who attended the lecture generally confirmed Suchev's assessment, even if they didn't agree with everything Prashad said.

"He went at such a rapid pace it was very hard to absorb the information," said Archana Indira, a sophomore at UMass. "Some of his arguments I didn't understand. Some of it was very interesting. It made me think."

"I thought it was kind of interesting how he mentioned how media comes into play...how all of a sudden everyone wants to read the Koran," said Saima Ahmed, a sophomore at UMass and member of SASO.

Prashad said he enjoyed interacting with the students at an intimate level.



"I like going to colleges when the students organize the talk. Then the students turn up," said Prashad. "It's not like a faculty seminar. I don't like the ambience of a faculty seminar. This is much more interesting."

Some of the debates during the conversation part of Prashad's lecture got somewhat heated, but that's what Prashad enjoys about his job.

For Sonny Suchdev and Saima Ahmed, Dr. Prashad's lecture rang very true.

"As a person of color growing up in the United States, born and raised in the United States especially being a turban-wearing Sheikh...racism has had a profound effect on me," said Suchdev. "Being ostracized, being 'other-ized', being dehumanized because of racial categories and the interplay of race and religion most clearly in the wake of September 11th-a lot of people say it just started up after September 11th but I was experiencing racism before then. It's just been more extreme since September 11th."

"I haven't had an experience with racism but I guess I see a lot of it," said Ahmed. "People make comments about other races like it's a joke. They use slang terms. They think it's a joke. I think...his point about racism is that it's subtle."

Asian Night auditions feature dance and song

By Catherine Turner
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Potential performers were going through round one of auditions in the Campus Center basement last night for the 19th annual Asian Night, sponsored by the Asian American Student Association (AASA), which will be held on April 13 in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Over 30 acts went on stage at the 2001 Asian Night, which lasted almost four hours. This year will present similar acts, including modern and traditional dance, which consists of traditional folk music and costumes. It will also showcase traditional and modern singing.

"Last year was very big," Yin Situ, a sophomore Sociology major and assistant of cultural education in the AASA said. "It was so big that the fire department had to come in and kick some people out."

This year's Asian Night will also be hosting keynote speaker Elliot Chang, who will be break his presentation into two parts: the first half will be comedy, the second will be political. The theme for the night is "Breaking Through the Waves," and will focus on Asian entertainment breaking into Hollywood.

"[Asian Night] is important to show people how we are, not to have stereotypes," Situ said. "To show that we're not just yellow skin and black hair. We have so many different cultures and dialects."

AASA consists of about 200 members from different countries including India, Korea, Japan, Laos, Thailand and China. A 25 member executive board chaired by sophomore marketing major Yvonne Law runs the organization. The executive board will also be judging the auditions and deciding on acts that will make it into the show.

There will be another round of auditions the first week of April in Campus Center room 163C.

Tickets for Asian Night are $5.50 an can only be obtained in advance by emailing aasatix@yahoo.com.

Veil of religion gone

All faiths come clean

More news from the Catholic Church on Wednesday, as Pope John Paul II accepted the resignation of a Palm Beach bishop who admitted to molesting a teenager in a Missouri seminary some 25 years ago.

Bishop Anthony J. O'Connell stepped down last Friday after allegations against him were printed in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

In a statement issued by the diocese, spokesman Sam Barbaro said, "It's a sad day for the diocese. Bishop O'Connell was much loved by the people and admired. But we must obey the Vatican's determination on this."

Well, yes. You do.

To think that abuse among members of the clergy has continued for as long as it has, and has remained unreported is horrendous. To add to that the fact that some individuals (let's say, Cardinal Bernard Law) still support these criminals by covering their tracks is atrocious and unforgivable. To make statements like this, after the accused has acknowledged his guilt and resigned, attesting to the good nature of the man is absolutely unthinkable.

The Catholic Church needs to employ full disclosure when dealing with similar cases. In no circumstances should they be allowed to hide behind the veil of the religion and keep secret the devastation that has been brought upon the lives of countless young children. And if that course of action causes embarrassment? Good. The loss of face suffered should only be the beginning of a process that limits the freedom these individuals have wrongly been enjoying for years.

The news of O'Connell's resignation came on the same day that The Globe ran a story of other religions plagued by similar misconducts. Hare Krishna temples are reportedly declaring bankruptcy in order to cover the legal costs of defending against abuse allegations.

Regardless of denominations, the same rules apply.

Any individual who has committed a crime, particularly against a child, should have his/her job terminated as well as all related privileges. They should not be shuttled from place to place. They should not be hidden under a veil of secrecy.

It seems like common sense, and the argument has been repeated time and again, in this publication and others. For those involved with the church, however, the message seems to have been lost. For whatever reason, they continue to ignore the general welfare of those they allegedly serve and cover their own tracks.

With their indiscretions now in the open and subject to public criticism, The Collegian hopes that similar actions are taken, and that other offenders take the steps to remove themselves. It seems simple enough. Until the church grasps that concept, however, it's an unfortunate situation we'll be mired in for some time.

BILL LARKIN

I've always wanted to be a jock. Back when we were all younger, everyone remembers wanting to be something they weren't. The nerds wanted to be popularity gods. The overweight plotters longed for days when they could be skinny. Even the dumb kids in the back of the room occasionally dreamed about being smart. And I, with not even a spec of athletic ability, wanted to be jock. This longing has crafted me into a total empathetic fan. I celebrate victories with the best of them, and I am ready to punch a wall when faced with defeat.

Amazingly, I'm not alone in my love of sports. Athletics, especially in high school and college, play an important and highly visible role. A school's athletic program is the first method of attracting outside interest. Sure, a school can have a terrific academic basis, but if you're not Harvard or Princeton, then it doesn't mean much to people outside the immediate area. A high school senior in Oklahoma trying to decide where to apply to college would not necessarily have even heard of school's like UNC-Oregon, or Indiana, if not for athletic teams that achieve national recognition. With all the publicity a university can gain from coast-to-coast exposure, it seems ludicrous to suggest scaling back on such a heavy recruiting effort. Yet low and behold, that is exactly what our glorious institution is considering.

We've all heard about the budget crisis so I'm not going to beat a dead horse. In synopsis though, the story goes like this: Two inconsiderate, ignorant asses play the role as governor Mr. Celucci and Mrs. Swift), and proceed to slash taxes when the Commonwealth has been money-coming in, and in addition under fund the official state university. If our governors had done their job correctly, we wouldn't even be in this mess.

REGAN MCKENDRY

Growing up in the eastern part of the state, I know that Boston College is the school in the Bay State. UMass allocated to that no man's land west of Worcester, is a forgotten afterthought. It's no coincidence either that BC plays in the Big East, one of the six huge athletic conferences in America, whereas UMass plays in our beloved Atlantic 10, which is in the next tier of sports organizations. BC Eagles football gets national coverage in Division I and semi-frequently makes it to a bowl game. The basketball team is consistently a prominent force vying for the NCAA tournament. And as far as hockey goes, all BC did last year was win the national title.

UMass, on the other hand, has had some hard times in its major sports. Football is played at Division I-AA and suffered through more injuries than a Friday night at Boston Medical Center during the summer. The basketball team is in the midst of rebuilding, but at least is making progress. Hockey still is trying to recover from the effects of a reinstating a dismantled program. At least in lacrosse UMass has a clear advantage over the snobs to the east.

As a major institution with 29 different varsity athletic programs, UMass is not all in a rut, though. Men's water polo went to the final four this December. Men's gymnastics is on a 10 meet winning streak, earning it a No. 7 ranking in the country. Yet, both of these programs, as well as men's tennis, women's volleyball, women's water polo, and men's indoor track and field, has been eliminated in order for the Athletic Department to slice $2 million from its budget.

As great as it is to toot the horn of the successes of these programs, that is not the argument against their termination. Thus the same logic is used for why even though the football team has hit hard times, it should not be shown the door either. Athletics should be the last, ultimate, final straw when it comes to a financial crisis. Period.

Of course academic programs are the corner stone of an institute of higher learning. At a school as large as UMass, there are too many different majors to list. Hell, we even let students play the role of imagineer with our version of the create-a-major, BDIC. Yet when times are tight, certain majors with miniscule enrollment at best, can be consolidated to better serve the institution as a whole. If a bunch of different cultural studies programs from across the world merge five departments into one, funds are saved and students still have their pursuit of academic advancement. The only change is instead of majoring in French and Italian studies, a person can major in cultural dynamics, with a concentration in French studies. In my own school, the College of Engineering, the method of combining majors has been used for as long back as I can remember.

Day care is another hot button issue. It was a great luxury to students (somewhat and employees (mostly) to have a well-run childcare center on campus. However, universities are not in the business of child care, regardless of what a UMPD officer will tell you after a Friday night in Southwest, and when monies gets tight, a university funded day care center must go. With athletics, the circumstances are totally different.

I alluded earlier to how athletics are the best example as to how a university can present itself and sell its role as an institution to the widest range of audiences. When the Minutemen play a game on a nationwide telecast, the rest of America can be reminded that this little school in Western Massachusetts exists and is something that college-age people they know should look into. Also, all that athletics are part of what make the college experience.

College is the time when people grow, develop, and learn more about themselves as people. College is just as much about the bullshit-test out-have-next Wednesday as it is about going to McMurphy's after the exam, getting drunk with the guitar dudes, and then grabbing a slice of Antonio's. It's the whole experience. Athletics make up the experience for a significant chunk of college students, whether it is those with the god-given gifts to play on the field of competition, or those like myself who live, eat, breathe, and sleep the life of a fan of the Minutemen and Minutewomen.

Think about UMass without the Mullins Center, the premiere arena in the Atlantic 10, and no basketball teams to support. Think about the school with no football team to root for on Saturdays in the fall. If such was the case, I'd look with a lot of longing to students at schools where athletics are placed in their rightful place of importance: Florida, Virginia, Ohio St., Illinois, Texas, Arizona, UCLA, the list goes on and on and on. Even UConn would seem a favorable place compared to an athletically dry UMass (man I feel dirty for just saying that).

People claim, correctly, that too many times this university has overly lofty expectations about how its athletic teams should perform against the nation's best. Our women's basketball team isn't in the same league as our Nutmeg State rivals, the same was our football team won't be taking on the Fighting Irish anytime soon. This doesn't mean that the school has to accept its place where it is. Who says it's bad to dream about establishing top-notch programs in sports to attract the best athletes out there and further increase the reputation of UMass? It sounds like nice plans to me.

Ultimately, those goals can't be achieved if the program cuts out teams just when times get tough. Once a team has been erased, it takes an eternity to rebuild the program (case in point the Mass Attack Hockey team). Two million dollars can come from elsewhere. This is a huge university with many hidden areas that gobble up monies unnecessarily.

In an ideal world, the financial panic engulfing this campus would not exist if the Commonwealth had better people in the corner office on Beacon Hill. Real life is not ideal. And if the university starts to slash into its athletic programs, UMass will permanently be handicapped against competing with comparable institutions as a place of higher learning. The game is tied in the fourth quarter with 12 seconds to go. Hopefully the Minutemen and Minutewomen can pull this one out.

The valley of the hawks

Am I the only one with sensitive ears? They've been ringing for a while, but the clamor has reached a knell. Soon, I fear, my ears will grow deaf. Am I an animal, like a dog that can hear the supersonic whistles their masters ignore? I feel caged and ignored, as if incapable of communication.

Last weekend, I sat in front of my computer, looking at The New York Times' web page. A current traveled from my eyes to my ears as I read from an article. It met that noise which haunts my ears, and caused an explosion, from which I am still shocked. I hope you can appreciate the cause of my suffering.

I now understand the limits of our compassion, the reservoir of our naivete, and the skylight of our might. The American led crusade for a global economy has only accomplished the construction of a global battlefield. The United States is a misled kingpin. It's incompetence as a global power may ruin the entire world. If the captains of capital cannot manage their subjects, then their kingdom is doomed.

Last week, the president missed an opportunity to promote trade and democracy while improving the public perception of free markets. Instead of punishing companies whose factories are located in oppressive countries, the president placed a tariff on the entire steel industry. It appears the powerful steel unions caught his attention, and he wanted to appease some Democrats irked by his recent politics.

As noble of a cause as labor is, swagger should not dictate our policy. It frightens me to think that any influence monger can control the reigns of our empire. Especially when that monger is so antithetical to the empire's traditional direction. How often has a Republican president thrown labor a concession in the past twenty years? Of course corporate executives can expect generous tax loopholes when such a president holds office, as evidenced by Bush's "economic stimulus" plan. But steel?

The president's ambiguity and whorishness indicates our nation can follow any path, not necessarily those that lead to glory. In fact, today's America is quite willing to wage war for the goals of its patriarchy.

On Sunday, a report escaped the Pentagon that calls for the development of new nuclear weapons, despite the president's campaign promise to reduce their number in this post-cold war era.

On Monday, the vice president visited our closest, and most hawkish, ally in Great Britain. Prime Minister Tony Blair expressed his encouragement for the United States to carry the "war on terrorism" to Iraq.

Also on Monday, as the World Trade Center memorial lamps beamed their pillars of hope for the first time, Israeli military imprisoned over 1,100 Palestinian refugees suspected of violent involvement. Over the weekend, 1,000 more were also detained. As Israeli soldiers moved into the packed refugee camps, they killed nearly 200 Palestinian resistors.

These represent just three days in the world America has created. We are slipping down a glass hillside into an inferno. We have jumped from the Cold War to the scorcher, and our chains have been cut. We act without mercy, and we do not act alone. On Tuesday, the president announced he was willing to train nations across the globe to fight in his "war on terrorism." Our mandate enshrined in the New York skyline, no nation dare oppose us. Those that would, these powerful enough to flutter a resistance across our path, face the growing threat of nuclear holocaust.

Well, at least I know now Dave Thomas is smiling. His life had meaning; the progeny of his life's labor thrives. We haven't forgotten the restaurant he founded, it's stock rises even after his death. At a fattening $51 a share, the franchise is encroaching on McDonald's reign as king of the global fast-food industry. Last month, Wendy's sales increased a greasy 3.9 percent.

I think I know why Thomas's heirs have been able to move so much meat lately. America has become a bloodthirsty nation. The extra-value or "free" accessories of pre-Sept. 11 democracy no longer satisfy us. We want for our management, making the meat seems the quickest solution, the one most likely to mollify us. And of course, we – the customers – are always right. Why should we complain when our thirst is quenched? After we have sped away from the grills, our bellies full and our hearts content?

But where Dave Thomas is laughing, Nevil Shute is crying. Shute wrote passionately about the apocalypse of nuclear war in On the Beach. You probably had to read it in grade school, and you probably missed his point. Or else you would have already heard the noise that haunts my ears. The screams of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The walls of the estimated 300,000 that died from "weapons of mass destruction" in 1945. The moans of the earth, whose ecology has still not been restored.

The Occupied Territories

Letter to the Editor:

Displaced athletes lost

Dear Editor:

Is this still my University? Is this still the place that it was when I first came here two and a half short years ago? A place that thrived on diversity, on caring for its students, on providing every service and every assistance one might need on such an overwhelmingly big and busy campus? Is this still a place founded in beliefs and traditions of excellence, of pride, of innovation, and of growth? Is this the place I want to recommend every high school student go? Or, is it the very place that will strip me of a whole piece of my self, identity, and life?

As of March 1, 2002, the head swimming and water polo coaches were informed that a letter was sent to the Board of Trustees recommending the elimination of the entire aquatics program at UMass-Amherst. This proposal carves out a large and supportive piece of UMass' athletic, campus, and alumni community and shows a total lack of respect and acknowledgement of the success and the championship record of the four teams involved. An alternative solution wasn't suggested? Across the board cuts? Was every option possible reviewed before a four-team program was on the board to be slain? Regardless, with one decision, one signed and official letter from Boston to Amherst, money is "saved" and I am no longer a varsity UMass athlete.

Yes, I came here for education, for the idealistic dream of finding a career path and finding a place that would nurture and would guide.

And yes, while I've found that in the classroom and in the library and in the offices of numerous professors. But I've also found that in the stuffy and chlorinated locker room of Totman and Boyden pool. I came to UMass first for studies and second for water polo, but it was my sport that gave me a sense of self and family here. I walked onto this campus freshman year knowing that while I would probably not see a single face I knew for weeks, I always had 20 girls who were automatically my friends, my comrades, my shield to what I did not yet understand or know.

Being an athlete, despite popular thought on campus, is not a glamour show. It is not a title that automatically opens doors and raises grades. It is a job, a full time, early morning, late night, time sucking job that requires as much and maybe more than a job would. It's as much about time management, leadership, learning, communicating, sharing, rising to the occasion, and picking yourself and others up when you've fallen, as it is about competition and practice and scholarships. It is a passion, a part of me, a part of every teammate I've played with, a part of every day I've spent on this campus. And it's in jeopardy of disappearing.

I don't write this for sympathy or for revenge. I write this for every time I've jumped into cold water at 6 a.m., for every time I've helped win a game, for every time I've worn UMass athletics apparel and felt chills of pride run down my sore and aching body, for every time I've said I am a

UMass athlete, for every time I've explained my sport, for every time I've cried to a teammate and for every time a teammate has cried to me. I write this as praise, as recognition, and as a desperate attempt even, to prove, if only to the page, that saving millions and slashing budgets and cutting programs does more than erase debt and shift the economic focus elsewhere. It rips open and robs me and every other athlete who might be told that they are no longer what they have, in some small way, always known themselves to be.

Sincerely,

Marique H. Newell

Lord Of The Pings: Fellowship Of The Ping

Another year, another Oscar race. Being a big time movie junkie (par for the course when you are a Theater major who wants to be an actor and filmmaker when you leave college), I follow the Oscars almost religiously, and I have a pretty decent understanding of who will and won't win. So I'm offering you, the Collegian reader, a handy guide to the Oscars to help you with that office betting pool. And since I've won Oscar-themed contests for over four years, I think I'm qualified to call myself an Academy Awards expert.

Best Picture

A Beautiful Mind (Universal) [will]
Gosford Park (USA Films)
In The Bedroom (Miramax)
The Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Rings (New Line) [should]
Moulin Rouge (Fox)

First let's eliminate the three that have no chance of taking home the gold. Miramax kingpin Harvey Weinstein has kept an almost unbroken decade-long stretch of Oscars nods going with the acclaimed In The Bedroom, but the movie may be too quiet for Academy tastes (the last time films like these actually won were in the early 80s when Ordinary People took home the gold). Still, its wrenching portrait of a family coping with tragedy is worthy of more than a few awards. Gosford Park always struck me as the kind of movie that gets excellent reviews but is ignored at Oscar time; plus, it's a comedy, and comedies rarely win. Moulin Rouge gets this year's Chocolat Award for Weakest Nominee of the Year. It's a Technicolor whirligig that's not as good as it thinks it is.

The Lord of the Rings deserves it, because, of the five, it ranks highest on my personal top ten list (at No. 5). It's the kind of blockbuster that rarely gets made anymore: epic and heroic, with an eye toward humanity rather than FX. It's that rare spectacle with as much intimacy as grandeur. Plus, it's also fantastically well made, gorgeous looking and joyfully adult rather than kiddified. But it won't win. That award will go to the safest nominee, Beautiful Mind. That film is a polished, serious drama with a high-caliber cast and crew team, another rarity in Hollywood. It's also a movie about overcoming the odds, and defeating illness, the kind of overdone subject that the Academy salivates for. Expect the feel-good film to triumph the violent fantasy.

Who got snubbed? Ridley Scott's riveting, harrowing and brutal drama Black Hawk Down is one of the best war films of all time, and it's a crime that it didn't get a nomination. But in the current political climate, what Academy voter would want to nominate a gritty, graphically realistic movie about a misfiring military mission? Mulholland Drive was David Lynch's best movie since Blue Velvet, but it may have been too edgy for even won the Supervising Actress award for an eight minute role in the overrated and mediocre Shakespeare in Love), and she's beginning to look like the Academy mascot. It has created the disquieting effect of making everyone of her recent performances appear to be geared towards the Oscars. Zellweger got the nod in a broad comedy, and the Academy doesn't award for broad comedies. She's hurt by the fact that, much like Reese Witherspoon in Legally Blonde, she gives a great performance in a merely good movie. With her win at the SAG Awards on Sunday night, Berry is one step closer to winning the gold. Why? Because, at the Oscars, the individual cate-

A Beautiful Mind / Gosford Park

By Jake D. Lewis

Contrary to opinions made by professional critics, the year 2001 has been, in my eye, a banner year for movies. In one year there was the re-invention of several dormant film genres like the movie-musical and the film noir, plus an evident gamble on Hollywood's part to spark big-budget franchises.

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences partially acknowledge the giant steps made in the film industry this year, while simultaneously leaving some glaring omissions from the ballots. Conversely, the Academy has also "over-recognized" some movies which might have been successful, even significant, but do not truly warrant the slew of nominations they have accrued. Finally, there are the movies that a person can be thankful about for not making the cut, even though there was a time that it looked like they would somehow, inexplicably, squeak by.

The Non-Nominees

Academy favorites Joel and Ethan Coen's The Man Who Wasn't There leads the pack in the category of movies that were passed over for this year's Oscar nominees. Granted, it wasn't their strongest film to date, but at least it warranted a Best Acting nomination for Thornton or a Directing nod for the Coens. Instead, it's only listed in one major award category, Best Cinematography (which is rich and beautiful), although its competition is fierce. The Man Who Wasn't There gave a quirky new spin to the film noir genre, weaving a story about a quiet barber who finds out his wife is having an affair with her boss. Our protagonist kills the head honcho, and then silently sits back as his life tailspins downwards. Usually, the Coens earn at least a Best Screenwriting nod, but unfortunately and unexplainably, the nominations aren't there for The Man Who Wasn't There.

David Lynch's Mulholland Drive was among the five Best Films of the past year, both in appearance and narrative. It showed us an emerging new talent with Naomi Watts and was strangely addicting in its story. The only trace you'll see of this exemplary filmmaking is in the Director's slot, but it's hard to imagine Lynch nabbing the award when he's up against Peter Jackson of The Lord of the Rings and Gosford Park's Robert Altman. As much as I would like to see Lynch win (as well as a sudden retraction of other awards in effort to give Drive more deserving attention), it seems very unlikely that this wish will be granted.

It came as a pleasant surprise to me, however, that Moulin Rouge was among the candidates for Best Picture (even though it won't win). What didn't please me was that its director, Baz Luhrman, who gave the film its inspired edge, was not part of the Best Director category. I am extremely confident in saying that Moulin Rouge would not have been the same enchanting, amazing movies in the hands of any other director. And I mean any other director. It's a dishonor to Luhrman and fans of the film to leave him out.

Other no-shows that were deserving was Kevin Kline's part in Life As A House, Haley Joel Osment's turn as a cyborg kid in A.I. Artificial Intelligence, as well as Spielberg's directing for that same film; a Best Screenwriting credit for the crew behind the superb remake of Ocean's Eleven; the unbelievable make-up by Stan Winston in the year's other remake, Planet of the Apes; the Pulp Fiction-esque foreign film Amores Perros (Love's A Bitch) and the other French contribution Brotherhood of the Wolf; a Best Picture opening for Memento, truly one of Hollywood's most intriguing movies ever; and Best Original Song omission of "Come What May" from Moulin Rouge. (So what if it was written for another film, thus disqualifying it? It was played in this one!)

Over-Nominees

I know I'll never hear the end of it when I write that The Lord of the Rings is the chief example of the Academy over-nominating a film. The direction is worthy of a nomination (although it did run too long), as is Ian McKellen's nod for Best Supporting Actor (it's about time he was in there). But I'm sorry, but Best Picture goes too far. A Best Picture should be just that: a film where each of its parts adds up to be a terrific whole. Apart from McKellen, the acting was only passable. Unless you're a die-hard fan (in which case you already disagree with me) the general consensus was that the movie ran too long, did not have enough storyline, nor had characters who were all that intriguing when it came to development and motivations, Best Original Song? Now they're just stretching it.

Again I'll probably be in the minority when I say that Gosford Park wasn't all it is cracked up to be. I personally found the plot very skimpy and without much direction. It was dizzying direction by Robert Altman (perhaps its intention, but uncomfortable so for me, at least) and wholly uninteresting. I expected more Agatha Christie, murder-mystery-mayhem than the upper-class sociality of England. This certainly does not deserve Best Picture, nor do the Best Acting nominations for Helen Mirren and Maggie Smith. Poo on all of them.

Bridget Jones's Diary received only one nomination, Best Actress for Rene Zellweger, but even that's too many. I said it then and I'll say it now – it was a cute movie. Nothing more. It's a pleasant way of spending two hours. But award-worthy? I just don't see the sense in it. So she gained 25 pounds and put on a phony accent. Yeah? So? Explain it to me, please!

Among the other praises disproportionately bestowed, chief among them was Ethan Hawke playing Ethan Hawke in Training Day; a Best Original Screenplay for the French treat Amelie (wasn't Best Foreign Film enough?); Pearl Harbor's Best Sound nomination; and Sting's dreary song "Until" from Kate & Leopold (It's about time to let Randy Newman win, ok? He's been nominated 15 times).

Almost Nominated, But Thankfully Not

I remember saying to myself that I wasn't hallucinating when I saw Cate Blanchett and Billy Bob Thornton nominated for the roles in the extremely weak action-comedy Bandits. I even considered going back to see the movie again to try and figure out what I missed that was so worthy of their performances (then I recalled how dreadful the movie was). I

That is the question

In the Bedroom / Moulin Rouge

By Nick Pizzolato
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This years Academy Awards are different. The films involved sample a large selection of film genres. From fantasy to action, from comedy to drama, this years films and actors from different types of movies have made their way into the Academy's good graces. From wizards to sportscaster's mentally retarded men to geniuses, and lonely singletons to turn of the century French harlots, the eclectic year in movies is honored in every category.

BEST ACTOR

The only really stand out thing in this category is nomination and acknowledgement of two black actors, Will Smith and Denzel Washington. In past years the Academy has been called bigoted as many of the nominees are often white and very few minorities are represented. This year however, the powerful performances of Will Smith as "the greatest" Muhammad Ali, featuring his battle to regain his boxing license during his prime fighting years as a heavyweight boxer. The nomination board also recognized Denzel Washington's brilliant portrayal of an inner city L.A.P.D cop, who has made his own rules in the war on drugs. Both powerful, and in some aspects controversial roles, and both were accepted by audiences and critics. Could this be the turn around for Oscar? Hopefully, actors like Don Cheadle and Laurence Fishburne will start to be recognized if this year's trend continues.

BEST ANIMATED FILM

The Academy has set up a new category for the growing number of well done animated pictures that find their ways onto the big screen. Movies like the nominated Shrek, Monsters Inc., and Jimmy Neutron: Boy Genius are all examples of films that have not only been highly received by critics but also people of any age. The growing number of these movies, starting as early as the Disney/Pixar film Toy Story have increased in popularity and the degree of technology that creates them. These films are almost always well written, made to capture the imagination of kids but at the same time, appeal to older audiences for having smart and intelligent dialogue. And with more films like Ice Age due out this year, it is almost a guarantee that these quality animated films will be a staple of the Academy Awards.

BEST PICTURE

This is probably the best cross-section of films that the academy has produced in a while. Last year the five best picture selection included two action movies, two dramas, and a romantic comedy. The year before almost all the nominees were dramas. And as we all know, they are more types and different varieties of films available to the public. This year the Academy did a very good job in incorporating different genres. A Beautiful Mind is about a schizophrenic genius (drama), Gosford Park was a period comedy piece. In the Bedroom represents another drama, the surprise pick was the outrageously designed Moulin Rouge, a film that crosses genres with musical/romance/drama and finally the science fiction epic Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring. J.R.R. Tolkien's hobbit masterpiece. There is nothing similar about any of these films. There is no common bond.

factor that explains why they are all there, except that the larger academy viewed them as being the BEST films of the year. Now of course, everyone's personal preferences come into play gories vote for their winners and nominees (i.e. directors vote for directors only, actors for actors only) – much like the Screen Actors Guild. And it would be nice to see Berry get it, considering that no black woman has ever won the Best Actress Oscar. But her little topless scene in the trashy Swordfish will likely hurt her chances with more prudish voters.

The award comes down to two competitors that are as equally likely to get it, so it all boils down to flipping a coin and hoping you're right. I'm going with Kidman as the ultimate winner because of her early momentum, her fantastic year (which cemented her as actress that will be remembered for years) and the "Julia Roberts Effect" – wherein she got so much buzz that there's no way to deny her. But her better performance came in The Others, in which her galvanizing turn as a haunted mother bought what little emotion there was to the vacuum-sealed creeper. Spacek's performance as grief-stricken performance, roiling with anger, guilt, desperation and sorrow even in the same scene, brought her back into the public eye. It's undeniably a powerful work, from an actress already familiar with Oscar (she won for Coal Miner's Daughter).

Who got snubbed? I thought surely that Naomi Watts would get a nod for her incredible, star-making performance as Hollywood innocent Betty Elms in Mulholland Drive. It may be the best female performance this year, and should've sat alongside Washington in the winner's circle. Then there was Thora Birch for Ghost World, and, hell, Witherspoon for Legally Blonde (if Zellweger can do it, why not her?).

Best Supporting Actor
Jim Broadbent (Iris)
Ethan Hawke (Training Day)
Ben Kingsley (Sexy Beast) [will]
Ian McKellan (The Lord of the Rings) [should]
Jon Voight (Ali)

It's all about Kingsley. He's been generating buzz ever since June for his role as a vile, psychopathic gangster in the Brit film Sexy Beast. It's a complete role reversal for an actor who won the Oscar for playing one of the ultimate good guys, Gandhi. Broadbent's film was too little seen (Oscars voters don't have to go the movies; they get video screeners that they can watch at their own leisure, or not at all if they choose). Hawke showed new dramatic force as an actor, playing an eager rookie who's not easily lured to the dark side, but even his nomination came as a surprise. Voight completely disappeared into the role of Howard Cosell, but he wasn't in the movie enough. Since I have yet to actually see Sexy Beast, I will say that the Oscar should go to McKellan's magisterial turn as the wise wizard Gandalf in Lord of the Rings.

Who got snubbed? A whole of worthy talent: Steve Buscemi (Ghost World), Hayden Christensen (Life As A House), Jamie Foxx (as corner man Drew Bundini in Ali), Viggo Mortenson (Lord of the Rings), Nick Stahl (In The Bedroom), Sean Bean (Lord of the Rings), Clive Owen (Gosford Park), Jeremy Northam (Gosford Park), Brad Pitt (Ocean's Eleven), and Luke Wilson (The Royal Tenenbaums) to name a few.

Best Supporting Actress
Jennifer Connelly (A Beautiful Mind) [will, should]
Helen Mirren (Gosford Park)
Maggie Smith (Gosford Park)
Marisa Tomei (In The Bedroom)
Kate Winslet (Iris)

This one is the biggest sure thing of the night. Connelly will win the Supporting Actress Award. She's won nearly every other award for the role, and the Academy loves to award ingenues in this category (Juliette Binoche, Mira Sorvino, Tomei, Geena Davis, Angelina Jolie). Occasionally, they will award an older actress over a younger one, but that's equivalent to a fool critic having sorbet between courses. I also think Connelly took a stock role, the woman who stands by her man, and imbued it with such stunning soul that she made it new again. Not only do I think she will win, I want her to win.

Winslet's movie was too little seen for her to win. Tomei had her best role ever, but she's haunted by the cruel jokes that surrounded her 1992 win for My Cousin Vinny. Mirren, as an all-professional housekeeper, and Smith, as a witheringly caustic socialite, will split the votes of Gosford Park lovers. If Connelly doesn't win, than I hope Mirren take's the prize.

Who got snubbed? Carrie-Ann Moss (Memento) and Laura Harring (Mulholland Drive) are two. But the biggest oversight was Cameron Diaz in Vanilla Sky. Anyone who still thought she was just another pretty face should be silenced by her ferocious performance as a deranged, obsessive lover in Cameron Crowe's thriller.

Best Director
Robert Altman (Gosford Park)
Ron Howard (A Beautiful Mind) [will]
Peter Jackson (The Lord of the Rings)
David Lynch (Mulholland Drive) [should]
Ridley Scott (Black Hawk Down)

Directors whose films are nominated for best picture never win, so you can rule out Lynch and Scott. Altman's tendency to shoot himself in the foot won't win over conservative voters, and hurt the legendary auteur. Jackson orchestrates the epic fantasy of LOTR with skillful aplomb, but some may see it only as a moneymaker not a gold winner. So that leaves Howard, beloved former child star (he was Opie and Richie Cunningham!) and director. And many think he was overlooked for Apollo 13. No brainer here.

Who got snubbed? If you nominate Moulin Rouge you should at least nominate its visionary director, Baz Luhrmann, too. Because of all movies released last year, it was the director's movie. It wouldn't exist without Luhrmann's wild, exhausting, sometimes spellbinding, sometimes absurd vision.

Best Animated Film
Jimmy Neutron, Boy Genius (Paramount)
Monsters, Inc. (Disney)
Shrek (Dreamworks) [will, should]

The newest category at the Oscars. Jimmy Neutron and Monsters, Inc. are both cute and reasonably amusing, but they are not Oscar films – they sag a little too much, and don't have enough for adults to clue into (Monsters, Inc. is especially disappointing considering its cadre from Disney/Pixar). Shrek was dazzling, inventive, witty, smart, colorful and the best film of last year. Undoubtedly it will win here.

crossed my fingers that the Academy would not repeat the same faux pas. Thankfully, they didn't.

Vanilla Sky was altogether a complete failure both financially and critically. Cameron Crowe could have edged his foot into the door of Best Director. Tom Cruise might have been a contender for Best Actor (after all, he did wear a mask) and Cameron Diaz might have hollowed through on her swing of Best Actress after a Golden Globes mention. All of these proved unfounded, letting us who saw the disastrous piece of celluloid breathe easier.

Jim Carrey's teaming with director Frank Darabont in The Majestic was a train-wreck too, although the latter is an Academy favorite after his previous Stephen King prison dramas and Carrey will probably never net a win. The Shipping News director Lasse Hallstrom and star Kevin Spacey were left out of the race for good reasons; and The Hughes Brothers's From Hell was mostly a critical favorite despite audiences being mixed on it's obvious; some of this year's best works are neglected, others over-praised, while the real bloozies are thankfully skipped. In the game of Oscar, it's a matter of skill, to be sure, but it's very clear it takes great luck to

Muse's wink wakes Dead

By Michael Delano

...AND YOU WILL KNOW US BY THE TRAIL OF DEAD
Source Tags & Codes
Interscope

Hand drawn images of lovers, soccer balls, parrots, men with crazy mustaches. Colored renderings and vivid photographs of scenic countryside, broken up by the vivid image of a man who has apparently ripped his own heart out. The packaging for ...Trail of Dead's most recent album Source Tags & Codes holds a mirror to their sound: chaotic, busy, confusing, merging the classic with the new, beautiful with the ugly, real with fantasy. The entire headspinning effect is likely as stark as their legendary live shows, revered for their complete anarchy that usually ends in some amount of blood loss and broken bones.

The album cover, the most simplistic of all the images, is the most telling. Simply the band's name over an amber stonewashed background, the 'T' in 'trail' is ridiculously ornate, barely definable underneath layers of vine and obscuring emblems. There is where you'll find the band's sound; a truly forceful and clear one so far submerged as to appear blurry and sometimes unrecognizable. Badly Drawn Boy also likes this technique, as his The Hour of Bewilderbeast willingly takes his strong singer-songwriter-composer skills and sabotages them with all means of discontinuity and bewildering production.

This clouding tactic dates back to ...Trail of Dead's first self-titled release from 1998, a poorly produced but promising jumble of a mess, with just enough light peeking through the gray to give hope for the future.

Source Tags & Codes is leaps and bounds ahead of its predecessors. You still get the grit and layer upon layer of sounds, but it's much clearer and less muddled. It's hardly straightforward, however; there are flugelhorns, violas, noisy song intros and vocal distortions, but the padding works to congeal the songs rather than bury them.

Love songs are ...Trail of Dead's biggest assets. Something just happens when they're writhing around in love that brings out their most memorable melodies and colorful songwriting.

Two such examples are thrown at ya from the start. "It Was There That I Saw You" finds rolling guitars jabbing forcefully ahead while the lyrics recall the good times, dropping to a pensive crawl when talking of the bad times, and returning with some affirming drum rolls for the hopeful conclusion. The incredible "Another Morning Stoner" anchors its expansive sound with an affecting guitar riff, both which pull against each other and bring to life the confusion and anxiety of the song ("I took your hand, led you astray/ you cursed the worlds I longed to save").

"How Near How Far," nestled snugly in the middle of the album, is its peak, a beautiful remembrance of past lovers as oil paintings. The refrain of "how near, how far, how lost they are," doesn't offer much hope, but the lyrics are breathtakingly graceful: "I've rendered every line/ Every contour of a muse's eye/ Painted in my eyes mind/ On canvases of time."

When not singing about love, success isn't as guaranteed. The title track, about a psychologically repressive town and self-definition outside of it, is as strong in purpose, if not execution, as the Deftones' "Be Quiet and Drive (Far Away)." Somehow, it ends up sounding overlong and direction-less, like "Baudelaire" and "Monsoon," even with the latter's brilliant imagery of God pissing on the world.

"Why is a song the world for me?" ...Trail of Dead asks on "Another Morning Stoner." There's no doubt the passion burns strong among these four, and when they're on, they're on. But where love songs have reduced other bands to sloppy messes in terms of creativity and composition, the Dead could never cede enough space to honor their muses.

when discussing these, but there had to be a majority of people who thought that all of the films contained a certain quality.

All of the films also contain different visions. From the small dialogue-based film like In the Bedroom to the large scale, grand vision of Peter Jackson's Lord of the Rings. It will definitely be interesting to see how people based the years best, on this cross-section of films.

Although debates ensue over which actors, actresses, and pictures should and should not have been nominated, this years nominees offers something to any movie fan. Be you a sci-fi geek who has seen Lord of the Rings ten times upening weekend or a teenybopper who thinks that Nicole Kidman as a French go-go girl is possibly the best role ever made, this year's Oscars will appeal to you. Hopefully, this won't be the last year when this great cross-section of films is seen.

BIRTHDAY BUFFY FILL!

ANGEL: YOU WALKED DOWN THE STEPS... AND...AND I LOVED YOU.
RUFFY: WHY?
ANGEL: 'CAUSE I COULD SEE YOUR HEART. YOU HELD IT BEFORE YOU FOR EVERYONE TO SEE. AND I WORRIED THAT IT WOULD BE BRUISED OR TORN. AND MORE THAN ANYTHING IN MY LIFE I WANTED TO KEEP IT SAFE... TO WARM IT WITH MY OWN.
RUFFY: THAT'S BEAUTIFUL. OR TAKEN LITERALLY, INCREDIBLY GROSS.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY MELISSA!

The Campus Center Student Union Commission is a student advocacy group empowered by both the undergraduate and graduate senates to address matters concerning the Campus Center and Student Union (CCSU) complex. These are two changes in the CCSU complex that could interest our student body and we would like to get your thoughts. The Coffee Shop in the Campus Center and the Games Room, located in the basement of the Student Union, are currently undergoing fundamental changes.

The Campus Center Student Union Commission met with the manager of retail services, Brenda Ryan Newton, to discuss the recent changes to the Coffee Shop. Several changes have been made, including the name, the organization of the facility, and the menu. More hot cases will be installed to provide students with different international style meals throughout the week. It is hoped that these changes will improve the ambiance of the Campus Center. Further changes to the menu are expected. The Commission office will work closely with Ms. Newton to ensure that the changes made fit the desires and needs of the UMASS community.

The Games Room has been a part of the Student Union for longer than most can remember. However, during the renovation of the University Store, the space was closed to provide the store with a temporary satellite location. Now that the construction is finished, the question is, should the Games Room be reopened in its original form? In previous years the Games Room housed pool and ping pong tables in a relaxed atmosphere. However, due to students' changing interests, the Games Room may be converted into a different type of establishment.

The Commissions office and the CCSU Administration have prepared a survey so students can share their perspectives and voice their concerns. Return this survey at any Blue Wall or Market Place Cafe register within a week and receive a free candy bar, compliments of food services. Late surveys will be accepted but candy bars are limited.

Would you like to see the old Games Room become a recreational facility? Example: Pool tables, ping-pong tables, video games.
☐Y ☐N

Would you like to see the old Games Room become more student oriented? Example: Student travel agency, music store, mini shopping plaza.
☐Y ☐N

Would you like the breakfast menu available all hours of operation of the Marketplace Cafe?
☐Y ☐N

What other recreational activities or student services would you like to see in the Games room?

What changes that were made in the coffee shop (aka market Place Cafe) have you liked?

What types of foods or menu concepts would you like to see on the menu?

Return this survey at any Blue Wall or Market Place cafe (previously the Coffee Shop). Register within a week and recieve a free candy bar, compliments of food services.

Done with the quiz. Here's what your results mean. If you come up with a tie, try watching both and pick your favorite.

Mostly A's: You are a true conservative that is tired of the "liberal" stance of the media and television in general. Those hippies hanging out by the People's Market make your blood boil. Your ideal show: "The O'Reilly Factor" with Bill O'Reilly, weeknights at 8 p.m. on FoxNews, starring hard-hitting journalist and best selling author Bill O'Reilly.

Mostly B's: You don't want to waste your time being another casualty of society. Most of what's on TV makes you want to upchuck. If you see another N'sync video on MTV you are going to put a brick through your television set. However, there is one saving grace in popular culture for you: metal, and especially the lovable Ozzy Osbourne. Therefore, your ideal show is "The Osbourne Family Show," starring Ozzy Osbourne, airing Tuesdays at 10:30 p.m. on MTV.

Mostly C's: Whether you want to admit it or not, you are a teenybopper at heart. If you're a guy, you secretly listen to N'sync, love using the smiley face icon on Instant Messenger and love shopping at Old Navy. If you're a girl, you have posters of popstars plastered on your walls, and spend most nights on the phone talking about your crush, while painting your toenails and reading Cosmo Girl. Of course, the ideal show for you is "Making The Band" starring The Big O, O-Town, airing as a part of the "Saturday Night Hookup" on MTV, Saturdays at 9:00pm.

Mostly D's: You are a conformist in every sense of the word. If it's cool, you do it. Therefore, your ideal show is one wear all the "beautiful people" try to act as cool as possible. Your ideal show is "Dismissed," MTV's dating show, which airs constantly at random times.

Mostly E's: Regular television doesn't satisfy your primal urges. You are a bit of loser. Your best friend is your high-speed Internet connection. You have an imaginary girlfriend/boyfriend. The ideal show for you is watching the scrambled porno channel, airing nightly on pay-per-view and Skinamax.

You don't have a job, so there's no money for you to buy the porno, so you just sit there and listen to the yelling sounds and stare at the scrambled screen hoping to catch a glimpse of something. Other recommended viewing: Any "Star Trek" marathon.

So there you have it, the shows that you, the Tube Notes reader, are most compatible with. Happy viewing.

Taking things to Heart

Sacred Heart up next for UMass; freshman Crane

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With a six-game road trip to Florida over Spring Break coming in just two days, the Massachusetts baseball team (3-2) will take a shorter trip South this afternoon.

Coach Mike Stone's squad will play Sacred Heart University today at 3:00 p.m. in Fairfield, Conn. in hopes of extending its winning streak to three games.

The Pioneers (3-3) are not the perennial whipping boys that their in-conference rival – and UMass' last victim – Quinnipiac is. The Northeastern Conference preseason poll placed SHU fifth in the conference, compared with a dead-last pick for QU.

Sacred Heart boasts an impressive leadoff hitter in senior Matt Lemanczyk. The outfielder hit for a .392 batting average as a junior and swiped 40 bases in 44 attempts.

The Pioneers also possess a very solid four-man starting rotation. Each pitcher started at least eight games for Sacred Heart last year. 6-foot-3-inch righthander Eric Bushor impressed in his freshman year. The Uncasville, Conn. native started eight games in his first year – going the distance five times for a 5-2 record. Bushor tallied an impressive 2.77 ERA in 55 innings pitched.

Senior Dave Rosso and sophomore Dan Scott also tallied five complete games apiece last season. Rosso went 4-4 with a 3.82 ERA, while Scott went 5-5 with a 4.79 ERA.

Stone plans to retaliate with freshman Mike Crane. Today's matchup will be Crane's first collegiate start. The Braintree native saw his first action 11 days ago in UMass' 6-0 loss at South Florida. The righty pitched two-thirds of the final inning of the road trip, facing three batters and giving up no hits and walking zero.

Crane, a Boston College High School alum, was named the Catholic conference Most Valuable Player after his sophomore and senior years. He tallied a school-record 25 wins over his career while striking out 263 opposing batters.

The decision to start the freshman comes as no surprise with the quick trip to Florida following the game. It also allows senior ace Jesse Santos to stay in his normal rhythm of pitching every Saturday.

Santos was named the first Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week of the 2002 season Tuesday. The Chelmsford native is 2-0 so far this season with a 0.56 ERA. Santos has pitched 16 innings in his two starts, including a complete game in the season opener against South Florida.

Making his success even more impress is the fact that Santos has had some moderate control issues in his first two outings. His strikeout-to-walk ratio is an even 1:1 and he has walked nine batters in his 16 innings pitched.

But Santos' resilience has been key thus far. He even loaded the bases in the first inning of his last start (Saturday) with two walks and a hit batsman, but got out of the inning without giving up an runs.

So far, that has been the key to his success

Women still battle for level playing field in the area of sports journalism

By Holli Armstrong
THE TIGER (CLEMSON U.)

(U-WIRE) CLEMSON, S.C. – Historically it has been a tough road for women who aspire to cover sports. When Lesley Visser started in 1974, there were just four women sports reporters in the country. Visser, who is one of the pioneers of the women's move from the news section to the sports beat, explains, "At first we were all just protected by our innocence and not really aware of what we were doing."

Today most major newspaper sports sections feature at least one woman's byline, and USA Today even has women columnists. Progress can also be noted on television. ESPN has women writers, editors, anchors and photographers. Currently all four major networks have hired female sports reporters.

"Since I started as a high school sportswriter nearly 10 years ago, I've noticed more women in the press box," said Vicki Michaelis, who writes for USA Today. "I wouldn't say it is dramatic, just steady. Certainly, there is room and need for plenty more."

Michaelis, a graduate of Northwestern University, got her start covering high school sports, then college sports, and finally professional sports. She has been working for USA Today for almost a year.

"Sportswriters should be able to see below the surface of a sporting event and give it texture," Michaelis said. "They should be professionals doing a job, not fans with a tape recorder and laptop. Sometimes it's hard to believe that I actually get paid to watch sports."

So why are more women not pursuing careers in the glamorous field of sports? It's hard to make a name for yourself in a male-dominated field. Women who do get in often feel unwelcome. Some reporters liken it to the feeling they experience when they walk by a construction site and are whistled and stared at.

For some writers the choice was simple.

"As scary as this night sound, I've wanted to have this job since age 12," Jodie Valade, who works for the Dallas Morning News, said. "I actually just found a report I had to do in the eighth grade about 'what I wanted to be when I grew up' and I wrote about being a sportswriter."

Valade, who was influenced by Free Press columnist Mitch Albom, enjoys telling the personal stories in sports. She also loves the adrenaline rush of scooping another paper.

However, she does not enjoy traveling to seven cities in 10 days as she has done covering the NBA playoffs, or the editors she has to deal with over the phone. A lot of times editors do not understand the trouble encountered when chasing after an athlete. Athletes require a lot of patience and editors are not patient people.

"You go into this profession with all these high ideals and noble ambitions, but it doesn't take too long to learn that like anything else, it's bottom line a profession," Valade said.

It is even harder when you are a woman.

Valade longs to have the same relationships with coaches and athletes that her male counterparts do, but instead she constantly has to prove herself.

"Male sportswriters can be buddy-buddy with athletes and it's fine. They can ask an athlete to have a beer after the game, just talk about the game and get some information, and no one would think twice about it," Valade said. "If a woman sportswriter tries to do the same thing, automatically everyone thinks she's hitting on the athlete."

An NBA writer I am good friends with is best friends with a player on the team in his city. How is that not crossing the line between professional/personal relationships? I was getting to know one Mavericks player pretty well, we developed a rapport just from interviews and talks. He told me to e-mail him and he would give me the 'scoop.' So I did and his response included things like, 'You're the prettiest beat writer in the world!' Obviously he wasn't trying to help me; he was after other things," Valade said.

Sexual harassment is a problem female sports journalists encounter. Valade recalls another Maverick player who would run his fingers through her hair while she tried to interview him. She asked him to stop and eventually had to bark "don't touch me," before he left her alone. His teammates even told him to stop. She reported the incident, and the player refuses her interviews now.

"In this business guys are constantly challenging everything you do," Valade said. Even male sportswriters are resentful of the women in the press box. They often think that they played their gender card to succeed. There is even animosity between women. Valade attributed it to not knowing how to deal with women when you are so accustomed to dealing with men, or maybe women just perceive other women as a threat.

"I think that it is human nature for men to treat women differently," Valade said. "But I think some athletes open up more to women, for whatever reason. The Mavericks' All-Star Michael Finley recently told me his whole philosophy on women sportswriters, and he said we had a distinct advantage. His theory is that nine times out of 10, an athlete will not be rude to a woman reporter when he would have been rude to a male reporter asking the same question."

However, this does not overshadow the fact that women are treated differently, especially in the locker room.

Ask any woman sportswriter if she is familiar with the plight of Lisa Olson, and she will say "yes." Olson, who in 1990 was a 26-year-old sports reporter for the Boston Herald, entered the New England Patriots locker room and left feeling that she had been "mind raped." Inside the locker room, three Patriot players led by Zeke Mowatt exposed their genitals to Olson while she was interviewing another player. "She is here, give her what she wants," Mowatt reportedly said. He fondled himself and continued making remarks based around the "every-woman-wants-it" theme.

Olson reported the incident to her editor, who notified the proper authorities. News spread to the media and Olson began receiving 3 a.m phone calls where the person at the other end would breath heavy and hang up. She changed her number six times, but could not escape the nightly harassment. Filthy letters filled with rape fantasies arrived and lies were continually spread about the locker room incident.

When her home was invaded and the words "Leave Boston or Die," were spray painted on her walls, Olson fled to Australia. A few years back Olson returned to the United States and accepted a columnist position with the New York Daily News. All was well until NFL great Reggie White and New York Knicks point guard Charlie Ward both spoke out against women in the locker room. The Knicks organization told Ward to keep his mouth shut.

White was in trouble from an excerpt printed in his autographically book entitled, "Fighting the Good Fight," in which he wrote, "I don't condone what they did, but I can see why those guys from the Patriots were driven to this kind of vigilante action. I've seen a lot of female reporters and cameramen ogling guys in the locker room."

In the Chicago Sun Times columnist Ron Rapoport said, "If he [White] comes up with any clever phrases for big strong football players who torment innocent women, I'll be sure to let you know."

Depo-Provera®
Contraceptive Injection
medroxyprogesterone acetate injectable suspension

Birth control you think about just 4 x a year

DEPO-PROVERA® Contraceptive Injection
(medroxyprogesterone acetate) sterile suspension USP

This product is intended to prevent pregnancy. It does not protect against HIV infection (AIDS) and other sexually transmitted diseases.

What is DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
DEPO-PROVERA is a birth control method of birth control that is given as an intramuscular injection in the buttock or upper arm once every 3 months (11 weeks). To maintain effective contraception, you must return for your next injection promptly at the end of 3 months (11 weeks). DEPO-PROVERA contains medroxyprogesterone acetate, a chemical similar to (but not the same as) the natural hormone progesterone, which is produced by your ovaries during the second half of your menstrual cycle. DEPO-PROVERA acts by preventing your egg cells from ripening. If an egg is not released from the ovaries during your normal cycle, it cannot become fertilized by sperm and result in pregnancy. DEPO-PROVERA also causes changes in the lining of your uterus that make it less likely for pregnancy to occur.
How effective is DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
The efficacy of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection depends on following the recommended dosage schedule exactly (see "How often do I get my shot of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?"). To make sure you are not pregnant when you first get DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection your first injection must be given ONLY during the first 5 days of a normal menstrual period, ONLY within the first 5 days after childbirth if not breast-feeding, and if exclusively breast feeding ONLY in the sixth week after childbirth. It is a long term, reversible contraceptive which, if administered as directed, is highly effective. DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection is one of the most reliable methods of birth control available. It is estimated that the average annual pregnancy rate is less than one (0.3) women using DEPO-PROVERA. The effectiveness of most contraceptive methods depends in part on how reliably each women uses the method. The effectiveness of DEPO-PROVERA depends only on the patient returning every 3 months (11 weeks) for her next injection. Your health-care provider will help you compare DEPO-PROVERA with other contraceptive methods and give you the information you need in order to decide which contraceptive method is the right choice for you.

The following table shows the percent of women who get pregnant while using different kinds of birth control methods. The method exactly as it should be used) and the typical rate of pregnancy in women who use it (method women who became pregnant because they forgot to use their birth control or because they did not follow the directions exactly).

Who should not take DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Not all women should use DEPO-PROVERA. You should not use DEPO-PROVERA if you have any of the following listed conditions:
• if you think you might be pregnant
• if you have any vaginal bleeding without a known reason
• if you have had cancer of the breast
• if you have had a stroke
• if you have or have had blood clots (phlebitis) in your legs
• if you have problems with your liver or liver disease
• if you are allergic to DEPO-PROVERA (medroxyprogesterone acetate) or any of its other ingredients

What other things should I consider before using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
You should have a physical examination before your doctor prescribes DEPO-PROVERA. It is important to tell your health-care provider if you have any of the following:
• a family history of breast cancer
• an abnormal mammogram (breast x-ray), fibrocystic breast disease, breast nodules or lumps or bleeding from your nipples
• kidney disease
• irregular or scanty menstrual periods
• heart disease or history of heart problems
• migraine headaches
• asthma
• epilepsy (convulsions or seizures)
• diabetes or a family history of diabetes
• a history of depression
• if you are taking any prescription or over-the-counter medications

This product is intended to prevent pregnancy. It does not protect against transmission of HIV (AIDS) and other sexually transmitted diseases such as chlamydia, genital herpes, genital warts, gonorrhea, hepatitis B, and syphilis.

What if I want to become pregnant after using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Because DEPO-PROVERA is a long acting birth control method it takes some time after your last injection for its effects to wear off. On average, it takes about 4 months (17 weeks) after the last injection for women who stop using DEPO-PROVERA in order to become pregnant. In a research study, 68% of those who became pregnant did so in about 12 months after their last injection, about 83% of those who became pregnant will do so in about 15 months after their last injection, and about 93% of those who became pregnant will do so in about 18 months after their last injection. The length of time you use DEPO-PROVERA has no effect on how long it takes you to become pregnant after you stop using it.
What are the risks of using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Irregular Menstrual Bleeding
The side effect reported most frequently by women who use DEPO-PROVERA for contraception is a change in their normal menstrual period. During the first year of using DEPO-PROVERA, many women will have one or more of the following changes: irregular or unpredictable bleeding or spotting, an increase or decrease in menstrual bleeding or no bleeding at all. Unusually heavy or continuous bleeding, however is not a usual effect of DEPO-PROVERA, and if this happens, you should see your health-care provider right away. After a year of use of DEPO-PROVERA, bleeding usually decreases and many women stop having periods completely. In clinical studies of DEPO-PROVERA, 55% of the women studied reported no menstrual bleeding (amenorrhea) after 1 year of use, and 68% of the women studied reported no menstrual bleeding after 2 years of use. If menstrual periods do not return within 2 years after the last injection, the chance is greater that you will not become pregnant. When your ovaries do not release an egg monthly, the lining of the uterus does not occur and, therefore the bleeding that comes with your normal menstruation does not take place. When you do have your menstrual period will usually in time, return to its normal cycle.
Bone Mineral Density
Use of DEPO-PROVERA may be associated with a decrease in the amount of mineral stored in your bones. This could increase your risk of developing bone fractures. The rate of bone mineral loss is greatest in the early years of DEPO-PROVERA use, but after that it begins to resemble the normal rate of age-related bone mineral loss.
Studies of Women
Studies of women who have used different forms of contraception found that women who used DEPO-PROVERA for contraception had no increased overall risk of developing cancer of the breast, ovary, uterus, cervix, or liver. However women under 35 years of age whose first exposure to DEPO-PROVERA was within the previous 4 to 5 years may have a slightly increased risk of developing breast cancer similar to that seen with oral contraceptives. You should discuss this with your health-care provider.
Unexplained Vaginal Bleeding
Because DEPO-PROVERA is such an effective contraceptive method, the risk of accidental pregnancy for women who get their shots regularly (every 3 months [11 weeks]) is very low. However, there have been reports of an increased risk of low birth weight and neonatal infant death or other health problems in infants conceived close to the time of injection such pregnancies are uncommon. If you think you may have become pregnant while using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception, see your health-care provider as soon as possible.
Allergic Reactions
Some women using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection have reported severe and potentially life threatening allergic reactions known as anaphylaxis and anaphylactoid reactions. Symptoms include the sudden onset of hives or swelling and taking of the skin, breathing difficulties and a drop in blood pressure.
Other Risks
Women who use hormone-based contraceptives may have an increased risk of blood clots or stroke. Also, if a contraceptive method has, there is a possibility that the fertilized egg will begin to develop outside of the uterus (ectopic pregnancy). While these events are rare, you should discuss them with your health-care provider. Call your doctor right away if you have:

What symptoms may signal problems while using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Call your health-care provider immediately if any of these problems occur following an injection of DEPO-PROVERA:
• short term loss (coughing up of blood, or sudden shortness of breath (indicating a possible clot in the lung)
• sudden severe headache or vomiting, dizziness or fainting, problems with your eyesight or speech, weakness or numbness in an arm or leg (indicating a possible stroke)
• severe pain in the calf of the leg (indicating a possible clot in the leg)
• unusually severe abdominal pain
• severe pain or tenderness in the lower abdominal area
• jaundice (yellow skin, eyes or bleeding at the injection site)

What are the possible side effects of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Weight Gain
You may experience a weight gain while you are using DEPO-PROVERA. About how much you'll gain is unknown. In a 2-year study of DEPO-PROVERA for contraception, women gained about 5 pounds the first year and 3 pounds the second year. Women in one study using DEPO-PROVERA for 5 years gained an average total of 8.1 pounds over that time. Obese women (or approximately 4 pounds per year). Women who continued for 8 years gained an average total of 11.3 pounds over those 8 years or approximately 1.5 pounds per year.
Other Side Effects
In a clinical study of about 1900 women who used DEPO-PROVERA for up to 7 years, some of the following effects that may or may not have been related to their use of DEPO-PROVERA: irregular menstrual bleeding, amenorrhea, headache, nervousness, abdominal cramps, dizziness, weakness or fatigue, decreased sexual desire, leg cramps, nausea, vaginal discharge or irritation, breast swelling and tenderness, bloating, swelling of the hands or feet, backache, depression, insomnia, acne, pelvic pain, no hair growth or excessive hair loss, pain, hot flashes, joint pain. These problems were reported to be very few of the women in the clinical trials, but some of these could be serious. These include convulsions, jaundice, urinary tract infections, allergic reactions, fainting, severe depression, loss of sex drive, hives, and other emotional disturbances, particularly epilepsy, blood clots or cervical cancer. If these or any other problems occur, you should discuss them with your health-care provider.
Should any precautions be followed during use of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Medical Checkups
During the time you are using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception you may get a period, or your periods may stop completely. If you have not been using DEPO-PROVERA injections regularly every 3 months (11 weeks), then you are probably not pregnant. However if you think that you may be pregnant, see your health-care provider.
Laboratory Tests
You will be scheduled for any laboratory tests set your health-care provider that you are using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception. Certain blood tests are affected by hormones such as DEPO-PROVERA.
Drug Interactions
Cytadren, (aminoglutethimide), is an anticancer drug that may significantly decrease the effectiveness of DEPO-PROVERA if the two drugs are given during the same time.
Nursing Mothers
Small amounts of DEPO-PROVERA can be passed to the nursing infant in the breast milk, no harmful effects have been found in these children. DEPO-PROVERA does not prevent the breasts from producing milk, so it can be used by nursing mothers. However, to minimize the amount of DEPO-PROVERA that is passed to the infant in the first weeks after birth, you should wait until 6 weeks after childbirth before you start using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception.
How often do I get my shot of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
The recommended dose of DEPO-PROVERA is 150 mg every 3 months (11 weeks) given as a single intramuscular injection in the buttock or upper arm. To maintain effective contraception, be sure to get the next dose of DEPO-PROVERA on schedule (that is, every 3 months [11 weeks]). Remember that the injection be given ONLY during the first 5 days of a normal menstrual period, if used following the delivery of a child, the first injection of DEPO-PROVERA MUST be given within 5 days after childbirth. If you are not breast-feeding or 6 weeks after childbirth if you are exclusively breast-feeding. If you wait longer than 3 months (11 weeks) between injections, or longer than 6 weeks after delivery your health-care provider should determine that you are not pregnant before giving you your injection of DEPO-PROVERA.

Women's lax lacks respect

But early success should gain national attention

By Glen Straub
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The men's lacrosse program here at the University of Massachusetts is one of the most respected programs in the entire country. It is one of the few teams in the country that consistently receives an ample amount of national attention.

Standing in the shadow of the men's lacrosse team is a club that has earned the right to be noticed by more than the few faithful on the Amherst campus.

After experiencing a disheartening 2001 campaign, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team has quietly constructed a wondrous start to the 2002 season as they have jumped out of the race with a 3-0 record.

"Granted, we haven't been receiving that much attention and we are not happy with that," co-captain Iada Emery remarked. "As long as we play hard and continue with our success, we will start to get noticed."

The Minutewomen's early success cannot be attributed to any one member of this team because, as head coach Phil Barnes has said all season long, "it's been a total team effort."

"Everyone has stepped up at one point this season," Emery said. "If one person is having a bad day, we all pick up the slack."

"If we play together, we don't need to have individual stars," the junior from Princeton, N.J. added.

Thanks in part to the "there-is-no-I-in-team" philosophy, the ladies who sport the maroon and white have demonstrated some stellar performances in their first three games.

A 15-2 bashing over Holy Cross in the opener, a surprising upset victory over the 13th ranked Hofstra on the road and most recently a hard-fought win against their intra-state rival, Harvard, have put the Minutewomen in a very confident mind frame.

They get a chance to extend their winning streak to four games as they face-off with the New Hampshire Wildcats today at 4 p.m. in the friendly confines of Richard F. Garber Field.

UNH will be making the trip to Amherst with a bit of a chip on its shoulder. In their first two games, they have been involved in two immensely close games – against Ivy League opponents, Dartmouth and Yale – and have come up short of a victory in both.

In their season opener, the Wildcats lost control of a battle with Dartmouth in the cultch when Dartmouth scored two goals in the final 3:15 to win the game, 9-7.

In the second game of the season, New Hampshire could never overcome a two-goal deficit at halftime against Yale and went on to lose, 7-5.

Despite New Hampshire's sub-par start, the Minutewomen know that they cannot expect to take the Wildcats softly.

"They shove it down your throat," Emery said. "They play a fast-pace game with a lot of one-on-one action."

Looking to stifle the intense UNH attack will be UMass junior goaltender Cyndi Doyle.

Doyle is currently averaging an unbelievable 4.41 goals-against per game. Her extraordinary numbers and leadership in the first three games have been the catalyst for the Minutewomen's recent winning ways.

"Cyndi is the back-bone of our team," said Emery of her savvy net- minder. "She gets you so pumped and focused for every game – it's unbelievable."

Against UNH, the strength of the backbone will be tested, but UMass knows that if they bring their "A" game, the possibility for success is high.

"As long as we go out and do what we have to do, our fine play will continue," Emery said.

Crooks enjoyed a successful first season with the Minutemen during the 1999-2000 campaign, leading the club in assists with 99 while ranking third in points at 11.6 per contest. That number would surely have been higher but for the fact that Crooks was forced to play the point rather than his natural shooting guard spot because of the play of BABC teammate Monty Mack. Mack averaged nearly 20 points per game that season en route to earning second team all-conference honors.

Despite primarily playing the point Crooks showed glimpses of his true capabilities while his Boston buddy was out injured. In the lone game that Mack missed in Crooks' first season, Shannon exploded for a career high 29 points on 12-of-24 shooting in an 81-72 win over Fordham. He followed this up with 20 just three days later during a 10 point win over St. Joseph's to earn himself the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week Award.

However, the emergence of Crooks did not directly translate into an NCAA Tournament appearance for the Minutemen. Instead the team was knocked out of the A-10 Tournament in the semifinals by eventual champion Temple and it had to settle for a berth in the NIT. In the opening round Crooks struggled, scoring a season low two points as the Minutemen fell 66-65 at the hands of Siena.

His junior season was not much better for the Boston native as the Minutemen started slow, winning just two of their first 11 games and finishing 15-15. Crooks' numbers dipped in nearly every offensive category, a fact that was magnified by the team's struggles. Despite making an unforgettable run to the A-10 Final and nearly earning itself a spot in the postseason, UMass once again fell to Temple at the final hurdle and was left on the outside looking in when the NCAA and NIT committees handed out their dance invitations.

The 2000-2001 season marked just the second time in the past 12 years that the Minutemen had failed to qualify for either of the postseason tournaments. It also marked the end of the line for head coach Bruiser Flint and Shannon's fellow Bostonians Mack and DePina. Those two graduated after the season leaving Crooks without his BABC teammates for the first time since he arrived in Amherst. But their impact on him both on and off the court would not be forgotten.

"It helped a lot to having Monty and Jon being here," Crooks said. "I grew with them and they're like brothers helping me do different things. Sometimes if I got out of line they would be there to keep it real with me. They definitely played a big part in me getting back on the right track and not going down the wrong road."

On March 26, 2001, just 16 days after UMass fell to Temple in the A-10 final, Steve Lappas was named the new head coach of the Minutemen bringing with him a new coaching staff, a new offense and a new role for the senior-to-be Crooks.

"Shannon's going to play all two [guard] which I believe is his natural position," Lappas said prior to the season. "He knows how to play and he plays hard. We are counting on him." With this early show of faith from his new boss Crooks, who along with Kitwana Rhymer and Eric Williams was named captain for his senior season, set out from day one to repay that faith and become the leader that Lappas was asking him to be. He improved his shooting from both inside and outside the three-point arc as well as his free throw shooting.

Crooks was the model of consistency during Lappas' first year at the helm, scoring in double figures in 24 of 29 games as well as providing much needed poise and experience on the perimeter for UMass. He led the team in scoring at 14.6 points per game while also ranking first in steals (37) and assists (116). His experience playing the point at this level has also helped Crooks ease the adjustment of first year point guard Anthony Anderson who grew up just a few minutes north of Crooks in Lynn.

"I think he helped Anthony a lot," Lappas said. "They're both from Boston so they have a little kinship there and they're pretty close so I think he definitely helped him."

Through his three years in Amherst, Shannon Crooks has become one of the most beloved members of the UMass basketball community, a point proved by the standing ovation that he received on Senior Night prior to his final game at the Mullins Center. On that night Crooks, who will graduate in May as a BDIC major with an emphasis on Mentoring Minority Youth through Entertainment, carried a photo of his late father Sam, who passed away during the summer of 1999, with him during pregame ceremonies in a tribute to the man who played such a pivotal role in helping him get to the point he is now.

"It was definitely important [to have him with me,] my father was always my number one fan ever since I started playing basketball," Crooks said. "He's been behind me and I thought that would be the right thing to do, to bring a part of him out there with me on to the floor. He's definitely been there throughout my career in spirit and Senior Day I wish he could have been there but he was there in spirit and I thought that was the appropriate thing to do."

While his UMass career may not have ended the way he would have liked, fouling out in overtime of a 65-59 loss to Xavier in the A-10 quarterfinals, Shannon Crooks can hold his head high after being such an important member of the UMass basketball family for three years. His skill, drive and determination will soon be missed on the Mullins Center hardwood but it will not be forgotten.

"He was a tremendous leader for us," Lappas said. "Without him I don't know where we'd be and he's really made a big difference. He's really done a great job; he stepped forward with his play being so consistent and his attitude, he's just been a pleasure to have."

Vermont goalie stars early, but falters late

By Eric Soderstrom
COLLEGIAN STAFF

AMHERST – Michael Gabel must learn to stop doing things like this. It's just not necessary to make the No. 12 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team feel like it can't score.

Vermont	3

"He was playing like a wall in there," UMass senior attackman Dan Paccione said. "Coach said he had 16 saves in the first half. That's a great game for a goalie if he gets that for the entire game.

"But he wasn't going to make another 16."

Led by Paccione's second-straight four-goal performance, the Minutemen exploded for nine goals in the final stanza to beat the Catamounts 10-3 yesterday at Richard F. Garber Field.

"We went into halftime and no one got upset [each other]," said Paccione, whose Minutemen (3-1) peppered Gabel (21 saves) with 30 first-half shots only to lead 1-0 midway. "No one got mad, everyone stayed composed. Everybody knew what we had to do, and that was to finish the ball."

And finish, they did. After a Vermont (1-2) goal three minutes in to the second half to tie the game at 1-1, the Minutemen went off.

With 10:12 to go in the third period, senior Marc Morley laced a low shot to the left corner to give UMass a 2-1 lead. Thirty seconds later, Paccione raced down the left sideline, cut in front of the net and touched twine to put the Minutemen up 3-1.

"Once you break that ice, once your score that one goal, then it's like boom, boom, boom," Paccione said. "We just kept getting more goals."

Morley's quick-stick with 8:41 remaining and Paccione's nearside laser a couple minutes later gave UMass a 5-1 advantage. Sophomore Jeff Zwicki found classmate Kevin Glenz behind the defense with 5:15 remaining for the easy score and Morley found a leaping Paccione a minute later for a quickstick tally to give the Minutemen a 7-1 lead with one quarter to play.

"They stayed pretty disciplined throughout the game," said coach Greg Cannella, whose team scored seven second period goals in a 13-10 win at Navy Saturday. "I think Vermont started to get a little tired and we scored all those goals in transition. That's where we're at our best. We played good defense, got ground balls and then started the breaks."

The UMass offense didn't falter in the first half. It dominated the Catamount defense and managed several open looks in the process. Gabel just played on his head.

"We were making the plays, we were making the shots, but it just wasn't going in," Paccione said. "It's very frustrating going into the hall only up 1-0 knowing we had a lot of shots. We were trying everything."

With 7:22 left in the second stanza, freshman Gene Tundo faked twice and took a shot from point blank range that Gabel somehow got his stick in front of. And with seven seconds left in the hall, Gabel got a leg on junior Kevin Leveille's shot from under two feet out.

"It would have been unusual if he had as good a second hall as he did in the first hall," Cannella said.

The last time UMass was held to just one goal was in 1964 in an 8-1 loss to Brown. Coincidentally, the Minutemen host the Bears Saturday at 1 p.m., looking for their fourth straight victory.

Senior Crooks ends a long basketball journey

By Justin Pearson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the most important aspects of building a successful college basketball program is holding on to your homegrown talent. California schools race one another for the signatures of the top California prepsters as do Florida schools, Texas schools and so on and so forth. If you cannot keep the local kids, you cannot expect to attract outsiders to your program.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team almost let one of the best high schoolers in state history slip through its grasp, only to be given a second shot with which to make good.

In 1997, Shannon Crooks graduated from Everett High School as the highest scorer in school history. By amassing 1,734 career points during his four-year basketball career for the North Shore town, Crooks defined himself as one of the best college prospects in the region. Crooks truly came into his own during his senior season under John DiBiaso at Everett, averaging 26 points, nine rebounds and nine assists on his way to earning his way onto The Boston Globe Super Team and the Boston Herald Dream Team.

But Shannon's high school exploits were not restricted to the gymnasium at his high school. He also experienced success at the prestigious Boston Shootout, one of the nation's top tournaments for high schoolers. He was named to the Boston team three times while at Everett High and helped lead his team to the title twice, garnering All-Shootout honors in doing so in both 1995 and 1996. Crooks was also a member of the esteemed Boston Athletic Basketball Club that included future UMass teammates Monty Mack and Jonathan DePina.

"I remember seeing him as a hard nosed tough kid who could score the ball, and I liked him" said former UMass head coach John Calipari, who along with numerous other Division I head coaches, including current UMass skipper Steve Lappas, watched Crooks' progress closely before leaving his post in UMass following the 1996 season to become the head coach of the NBA's New Jersey Nets.

However, Crooks decided initially not to join his BABC teammates in Amherst and instead headed off to the bright lights and skyscrapers of New York City and Big East powerhouse St. John's. But after being "the man" in Everett, Crooks struggled to adjust to life deep on the Red Storm bench. He appeared in just 23 games under Mike Jarvis averaging less than two points per contest.

Despite appearing in the NCAA Tournament in '97 with the Red Storm, Crooks opted to transfer out of New York and into UMass and the open arms of head coach James "Bruiser" Flint. While this seemed like a dream scenario for both Crooks and the University, both sides would have to wait a year to find out for sure as, per NCAA regulations, Shannon was forced to sit out a year before joining the Minutemen.

"I felt comfortable down there [at St. John's] to a certain extent, but home is home," Crooks said. "I'm two hours away from home and I got to be close to my mom during those trying times (the transfer and his father's ailing health) and that was the most important thing, making sure she was all right, that was my main focus. But once I was all set sitting out I got a chance to dive back into basketball. But I think that year sitting out and me being close to home helped my family situation a lot and that is something you have to do in life."

Finally, on Nov. 20, 1999 Crooks was able to make his debut for the Maroon and White, scoring 11 points and grabbing five rebounds in an 85-77 triumph over Iona. The Shannon Crooks Era had officially begun in the Pioneer Valley.

Softball from the suitcases

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts softball team has played its first 17 games on the road so far, with plenty more to come before its first home contest on March 30. But if UMass is suffering from any sort of homesickness, it hasn't exactly affected their play.

The Minutewomen will take their 10-7 record to the road yet again when they head to the Sunshine State for the second straight weekend for the Blue and Gold Tournament in Miami, Fla. This will be the fourth invitational for UMass on this young season, and again will feature tough competition from all over the nation, including four nationally ranked opponents. But despite all of the trips to the sunny South of the United States, the Maroon and White won't be sad to leave the sun for more overcast Northeast weather.

"There's nothing enjoyable about living out of a suitcase but we just don't have the weather," Head Coach Elaine Sortino said.

First up in Miami for the Minutewomen is Illinois-Chicago, a team that defeated them 2-1 on Feb. 24. In that game, UMass surrendered two runs in the bottom of the seventh inning to drop a heartbreaker, so it will look to even the score when it takes on the Flames on Friday as well as on March 19.

"As much as I don't want to play them [up to] four times, I think they'll be a good team to play," Sortino said. UIC enters the game with a 16-8 record, including a victory over No. 4 Nebraska to its credit.

Also slated on the UMass schedule is Florida International, which enters the tournament with a 19-16 record. The Golden Panthers have wins over Florida, Florida Atlantic, and UConn, among other teams this year.

"They're going to be deceiving," Sortino said. "They were in the national rankings, I think they've just getting off to a slow start."

And last, but not least, the Minutewomen will be taking on fellow Atlantic 10 opponent Fordham. UMass swept three games from the Rams last season, and will be looking to do the same again in Miami, as Fordham has a meager 2-5 record in 2002. However, Sortino was not pleased when discovering that the Rams were in the same tournament, saying that she did not want to have to play a conference opponent while participating in a non-conference tournament.

At the Seminole Invitational last weekend, the Maroon and White finished as the winner of the Gold Bracket consolation championship, finishing with four wins against two losses. Pitching was again what propelled the Minutewomen to victory, as they were able to produce several fine performances on the weekend, highlighted by one of the team's newcomers. In only her second start at UMass, freshman Kelli Arnold blanked Providence and gave up only a bloop single as the Minutewomen romped, 8-0. Arnold continues to impress as she has posted a microscopic 0.72 ERA in five appearances while whiffing 15 hitters. The Maroon and White also picked up wins against Southeastern Louisiana, Southern Illinois, and No. 22 Florida State. The pitching has been the "name of the game" all year according to Sortino, and is the main reason that her squad has been able to beat teams such as No. 3 Stanford.

"Good pitching keeps you in any game, and that's why we've gotten some of our huge wins," Sortino said. "[But] hitting will come and go."

The Minutewoman lineup has also begun to receive solid contributions from up and down the lineup. Leadoff hitter/shortstop Emily Robustelli and first baseman Brandi Cross throttled opposing pitchers, each producing eight hits in the Invitational, with Cross driving in a team-high six runners and Robustelli crossing the plate five times. Scooter Wheeler also cracked her first home run of the year against the Friars, giving her a school-record 18 four-baggers for her career.

Simply put, the Minutewomen want to begin their Atlantic 10 season as soon as possible, because Sortino said the lack of games played compared to California or Florida schools has kept them out of the Top 25. Once they can start into the bulk of their schedule, the score will become more even.

Because in two weeks, at the first home game on March 30, according to Sortino it will be "the best day in the world for a UMass softball player."

Faculty approves Declaration of Principle

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate voted to endorse the Faculty and Librarian Declaration of Principle at their 603rd meeting after opening with what one senator described as "fireworks" yesterday.

The Senate passed the declaration during their regular business, which was delayed by several motions to suspend the rules of order and place items first on the agenda.

The declaration stated that the faculty and librarians at the Amherst campus were "deeply distressed" at the budget cuts, the administration's handling of those cuts and the "prospective loss" of academic quality. The motion, which passed with no dissenting votes, asked administrators and government officials to take action on behalf of the University.

"We call on the governor, the legislature, the trustees of the University, the President of the University, and our own administrators, to declare similarly their belief in what we stand for, to represent us to the public, to mobilize opinion on behalf of our students, to reinforce the best visions of what the University is about," the motion stated.

This motion and other reports were heard after the meeting was called to order – much after than usual.

A motion to suspend the rules and to begin asking questions — usually reserved for the end of the meeting — was passed immediately after the Senate was called to order. Senator Craig Moore, a Management professor and chair of the Program and Budget Council quizzed interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams over a report published in the Daily Hampshire Gazette. The report stated that UMass Athletic Director Robert Marcum did not anticipate any more cuts to sports.

"Those kinds of statements don't help with trust," Moore said.

Moore sponsored a bill four weeks ago that asked for a two million dollar reduction over four years to the Athletic department budget. Seven sports were eliminated on March 12, which cut 1.1 million dollars from the budget. Moore wondered why over half a million dollars was being was being returned to athletics.

Williams explained that the money would be used to secure the student-athletes' financial aid packages, which are being offered to them for next year despite the cuts. Williams apologized for any confusion.

"Ultimately there will be a one million dollar reduction from the athletic budget," Williams said. "The intention was not to obfuscate or to appear to be doing more than we are doing. I apologize for the misinterpretation."

Senator Richard Bogartz, a professor of Psychology, wanted to know if Williams intended to respond to General Court Speaker Thomas Finneran's alleged comments that the cuts to the University's budget is a "shaving" and that the protests on campus have been nothing more than "academic noise."

"I believe this cries out, that this University needs a chancellor that will rebut this in a public way with facts and figures," Bogartz said. "Do you [Williams] plan to rebut this?"

Williams said she had no plans to rebut the statements because legislators she talked with said they did not feel that way, and that the academic noise referred to "the how" of the protests, rather than "the why."

The rules were suspended again when Senator Joseph Donohue, an English professor, rose to sponsor a motion to invite President William Bulger and the Board of Trustees to visit the Amherst campus and discuss the budget situation before the end of the semester.

"The current fiscal crisis is unprecedented, the ranks of faculty are thinning ... the viability of programs are being threatened ... students cannot graduate in the customary four years," Donohue listed.

The motion passed. The rules were suspended a third time for Senator Ernest May, a professor of Music and Dance to submit a motion to give the Program and Budget Council more ties with the administration on budget issues. This also passed.

Presiding Officer of the Faculty Senate Frank Hugus, a professor of German, called the flurry of parliamentary procedure that began the meeting "uncharacteristic."

Celebrations honoring St. Patrick's Day

A look at the lucky shamrock

By Jennifer Eastwood
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A wee, little three-leafed clover is seen as a lucky charm by many superstitious bystanders. It is renowned as the symbol of Ireland for its representation of national heritage and rebirth at springtime. It is even seen as the ever-popular caricature of the St. Patrick's Day holiday.

It is, of course, the shamrock. This little plant has spanned across generations as a meaningful emblem, but what of its origins? The popular myth is that St. Patrick associated the shamrock with his Biblical teachings. However, this legend has yet to attest to historical records.

"Although it is widely believed that St. Patrick used the shamrock to illustrate the Christian doctrine of the trinity, this idea cannot be proven," the History Channel online stated. "In fact, the first written mention of this story did not appear until nearly a 1000 years after Patrick's death."

The initial reference of a shamrock in written English dates back to the year 1571, just over a hundred years later in 1681, references were made that the clover was worn as a badge on one's suit lapel on the Saint's feast day, thus rising as the Irish symbol of nationalism.

"As the English began to seize Irish land and make laws against the use of the Irish language and the practice of Catholicism, many Irish began to wear the shamrock as a symbol of their pride in their heritage and their displeasure with English rule," explained the History Channel online.

The shamrock soon became viewed as a rebellious act and eventually deemed forbidden for guards in the Irish regiments to display. As time passed, it became incorporated into the emblems of the United Kingdom, along side symbols of a rose, thistle and leek.

"So today, on St. Patrick's Day, a member of the British Royal Family presents [a] shamrock to the Irish Guards regiment of the British Army," stated the Web site theholidayspot.com.

Information for this story came from the History Channel online and theholidayspot.com.

The Holyoke St. Patrick's Parade of years past. The 2002 parade will begin at K-Mart Plaza in Holyoke at 11:30 a.m. on Mar. 17.

Nine steps for St. Pat's Day with Clare Chadburn

1 Start the pub-crawl early: Amherst has only two Irish pubs: Mc Murphy's and The Harp. Mc Murphy's, a student sports bar, began its celebrations in September with a "Half Way to St. Patrick's Day" event. If you missed that, The Harp, 163 Sunderland Rd., will be serving alcohol from 8 a.m. onward all weekend long. The Harp is just a five-minute walk to the left from the bus stop outside the House of Teriyaki. And by the time you've made your way around its five different Irish beers and stumbled through its nine varieties of Whiskey, you won't be able to walk much further anyway.

2 Line your stomach: A cabbage and a corned beef sandwich is the Irish-American delicacy for the day. When the Irish immigrants arrived in America during the potato famine and found their staple bacon and potatoes in short supply, they borrowed corned beef from their Jewish neighbors and so began the tradition. Don't indulge too much if you intend to be sociable the next day.

3 Guys: shave off your beard: Mark Power, owner of The Harp, and five of his friends started the Amherst tradition of growing their beards from Halloween to St. Patrick's Day, then shaving them off in the pub for charity. The annual chop (which includes both whiskers and heads) unites both the Pagan and Christian festivals and provides a spot of local entertainment.

4 Girls: show some Gaelic glamour: Dress up in something short and green and enter yourself as the "Holyoke Colleen" in the Holyoke Parade on Sunday in front of 1.4 million spectators. The parade, one of the three largest in New England, celebrates its 50th anniversary this year.

5 Guys and Girls: share a Shamrock: If you can't get any imported, you should take a walk by the conservatory greenhouses. They have a couple of imitation weeds that would do the job. In Ireland, a Shamrock is sent between friends and family, so the larger, the better.

6 Try a couple of tongue twisters: After you've sampled a few Black Velvets (Champagne and Stout) and a Bailey's with Guinness, try to imprest with a couple of Irish phrases. "Pogue ma hone" (translated to "kiss my ass") is a good one not to use on the bar staff. Incidentally, the Irish band The Pogues used that phrase as their original band name but were told to change it, so now they're just "The Kiss" – boring!

7 Try and tell a long joke: Late one Friday night, a policeman spotted a man driving very erratically through the streets of Dublin. He pulled the man over and asked him if he had been drinking that evening.

"Aye, so I have," the man said. "'Tis Friday, you know, so me and the lads stopped by the pub where I had six or seven pints. And then there was something called 'Happy Hour.' They served these mar-garitos, which were quite good. I had four or five o' those. Then I had to drive me friend Mike home. O' course, I had to go in for a couple of Guinness. Couldn't be rude, ye know. Then I stopped on the way home to get another bottle for later..."

The man then fumbled around in his coat until he located his bottle of whiskey, which he held up for inspection. The officer sighed, and said, "Sir, I'm afraid I'll need you to step out of the car and take a Breathalyzer test."

Indignantly, the man said, "Why? Don't ye believe me?!"

8 Hangover cure (Massachusetts style): "Drink half as much as you should [on St. Patrick's Day]," Mark Power provides as his sensible advice for preventing a hangover. The technical method is to drink four ounces of water for every beer or shot. Be forewarned that bars in Amherst will shut promptly at 1 a.m. Also note it is against state law to drink if you are under 21, and always have a designated driver.

9 Spread your Lucky Charms: Finally, if you're not 21 or you're straightedge or you don't like corned beef and cabbage or you just don't understand what I've been going on about, don't despair. Everyone can still share a little Irish spirit with his or her neighbors. Just take a handful of the frosted cereal with colored marshmallow pieces from the Dining Commons, wrap a small piece of green velvet around your waist and distribute the bits liberally around campus.

New Mexico State U. may dismiss parking tickets if students vote in elections

By Mark Hall
The Round Up (New Mexico State U.)

(U-WIRE) LAS CRUCES, N.M. - Students who never or rarely vote in Associated Students of New Mexico State University presidential elections could have a new incentive to do so.

The reward: the dismissal of a parking ticket.

Bill 148, authored by ASNMSU Sen. Chance Chaffin (Engineering), has the stated purpose, "to create an incentive for members of ASNMSU to vote in elections while establishing a method of relief from our current lack of accessible and convenient parking."

While the bill was passed by the ASNMSU Senate in a meeting last Thursday, the final decision will be made by the NMSU Board of Regents. Antonia Roybal, the student regent at NMSU, said she thinks it's always a good idea to help students with parking, but has some reservations about the bill concerning money and voting.

"I think it needs to be researched further. I don't know if this is the answer," Roybal said. "Parking should not be part of ASNMSU, it's going to cost parking some money.

"Voting is a responsibility and privilege of students, and if your not going to take that interest, why should you get paid to do it?" Roybal asked.

During 2000-2001, the Parking Department earned $242,277 in parking ticket revenue, a $133,496 loss from 1999-2000 total of $375,773, NMSU Police Capt. Stephen Lopez said. He said the reduction in revenue is due in large to the "First One Free" program implemented by parking last year. The program allows students a one-time deal in which they get a parking ticket waived.

Lopez said if parking loses more money because of the bill, it wouldn't be able to repave or make new parking lots, pay the student employees and provide new lighting in the parking lots. "We wouldn't be paving parking lots for a while," he said.

However, Lopez said he supports the concept of the bill — to increase voter turnout, but ASNMSU would have to find a way to compensate parking.

Chaffin said his solution to compensate parking would be to pass a resolution through the Senate (a resolution is a passed suggestion) directed at the Board of Regents, suggesting a $10 increase in the current cost of parking stickers. The current price of a parking sticker is $20 for a full year and $14 for a half year.

Chaffin said if the bill is approved by the regents, an estimated 4,000 students will vote in this spring's presidential election, a projected increase from the 1,800 of 2001. He said he would agree to giving the program a one-year trial before any permanent plans were made.

Chaffin said he received the idea for the program from a Virginia Tech senator he met at the Conference of Student Government Associations last year.

The NMSU Police Department is currently conducting a study that would measure student (main campus and Doña Ana branch) and faculty and staff attitudes concerning the bill. The study will end tomorrow.

UCLA reflects on affirmative action ban

By Sophia Chakos-Leiby
Daily Bruin (U. California-Los Angeles)

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES - On Mar. 14, 2001, more than 1,000 people swept across the UCLA campus protesting the statewide University ban on affirmative action. Their protests ended when a couple hundred students staged a sit-in at Royce Hall - disrupting the mayoral debates scheduled for that night.

In light of the one-year anniversary, students and faculty reflect on the current status of university affirmative action policies and the state of political activism on campus.

Student activism has become more fragmented as individual student groups pursue a variety of issues, such as outreach and tolerance after Sept. 11.

"There has not been an issue that a broad base of students feel they can unite around," said Li'i Furumoto, director of Xinachtli, a program that mentors underrepresented high school students in Santa Monica and Venice.

Though access to education remains a hot issue, the protests are more individualized - as opposed to last year's collective campus effort against the ban on affirmative action.

This year, there is less activism since polices of SP-1 and 2 have been repealed, said policy studies professor Andrew Sabl. These two plans, adopted by the UC Board of Regents in 1995, banned racial preference in admission and hiring decisions.

Two months after last year's protest, the regents unanimously rescinded both resolutions.

Ryan Smith, a third-year political science student, said the repeal of SP-1 and 2 reflected the influence of last year's protest on the regents - as well as the power of student activism in general.

During the protests, students and community activists gathered from across the state to show support.

"The rally was not only symbolic of what needs to change, but also what happens when people unify for a cause that's greater than themselves," Smith said.

But the repeal actually exhausted student activism on campus, Sabl said.

"It was a symbolic victory, but that does not mean this issue is over," Sabl said.

Proposition 209, passed by California voters in 1996 to outlaw public institutions from using race in admission and hiring decisions, still governs the state.

"UCLA has an incredibly rich history in student activism that dates back to the 1960s," Smith said. "It did not start, nor will it end, with affirmative action."

Instead of SP-1 and 2, students this year rallied in favor of Assembly Bill 540, which would decrease "long-term" California resident fees for undocumented immigrants and out-of-state students who graduate from a California high school.

Another approach students are focusing on to increase accessibility is the development of programs that serve underrepresented communities, Furumoto said.

"The university is currently servicing the elite of California and Los Angeles, but our purpose is to service everyone," she said. "The system is supposed to be equal, and they are not fulfilling their responsibility in this educational process."

There has not been any event as big as last year's protest, but neither has there been a decrease in students' fight for social change, Smith said.

In their outreach to L.A. communities, programs like Xinachtli (which works out of the Community Programming Office) provide mentoring services and academic tutoring for underrepresented high school students to counteract the educational imbalance that exists within California's public school system, Furumoto said.

Muslim Students Association political action coordinator Ghaith Mahmood said the events of Sept. 11 also changed the issues tackled by student activists on campus.

"This school year, the focus has shifted to Sept. 11 and the war. There is a lot going on at UCLA to humanize each other's struggles," Mahmood said.

Students participated in forums such as "Miseducation of a Nation," co-sponsored by MSA and other organizations, to discuss stereotypes and racism post-Sept. 11.

This year, there has also been less opposing activism between the MSA and the Jewish Student Union - who last year held many counter-rallies about Palestine and Israel, respectively.

"There is a different vision as a step to address world issues... and now many communities are reaching out to each other," Mahmood said.

NCAA gambling is favorite pastime for students

By Arun Gopal
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. - Tuesday night's Siena-Alcorn State contest may not have meant much to the average person, but to fans of college basketball, it could mean only one thing — the start of the NCAA Tournament.

Aside from the Super Bowl, the NCAA Tournament may be one of the biggest betting bonanzas of the year. From coast to coast, countless people (whether they are students or professionals) enter gambling pools related to the Big Dance.

Often, for just a few dollars, people can submit multiple brackets in the hopes they might get lucky, win a tournament pool and reap a large financial reward at the end. There are also numerous free pools available online (at Web sites like ESPN.com or CNNSI.com), so it is entirely possible to take part in March Madness without spending a dime.

The practice of betting on the NCAA Tournament isn't something restricted to the college-age crowd. Many people get involved in the NCAA Tournament gambling at a very young age.

"I've been involved with tournament pools for about eight years," University of Michigan LSA senior Robert Clubb said. "It's something I've always enjoyed doing."

Picking the winners of the individual games always has been a hotly contested issue. There are those who believe a lot of skill is necessary to pick the winners. That may be true to an extent, but Clubb holds a much more realistic view.

"A lot of it is luck," he said. "You could watch every single game during the year and still do horribly in a pool."

A lot of people choose to enter an NCAA Tournament pool with a group of friends. Aside from the obvious benefit of raking your friends' money, entering a pool with people you know can make the whole experience more enjoyable for everybody.

"I think most people do it with their friends or with their work," LSA senior Michael Finc said. "If you throw in a little bit of money, you could make a lot."

It probably does not come as much of a surprise that numerous students are interested in basketball betting pools. But what might come as a little bit of a shock is the fact that adults can get involved in the NCAA Tournament gambling, too.

Biology professor Ken Balazovich said when he worked at the University Medical School several years ago that some people he knew had a very large pool. They would hand out a sheet and collect $20 per person. There were a large number of people who would participate, probably 75 to 100 people that would participate in that pool."

Balazovich's situation was a little different from what students face. While the average student may see a gambling pool as a clear chance to make a few extra bucks while watching obscene amounts of basketball, Balazovich had a different theory for why the particular pool he was involved in had such widespread appeal.

"I don't think they were really into [the money]," Balazovich said. "I think many people were just excited, because it was the NCAAs, and a lot of times Michigan and Michigan State were in it. People were just very interested in the basketball games themselves [...] I think the pool was just sort of a competition thing. We were in research, and there was always competition with everything. People would just have fun with each other in labs, and because lab work is sometimes very intense, this was just another outlet for us."

Although Balazovich did not put any money into his tournament pool — as it turned out, he ended up winning — it is a very common practice for people to toss a few dollars into a pool in the hopes they could end up winning the whole pot.

This, of course, is a direct form of sports gambling, an act which is frowned upon by the NCAA. This is especially salient when an NCAA athlete is the one placing bets (e.g. Florida guard Teddy Dupay, who was kicked off the team for gambling prior to this season). The question remains whether or not it is really all right for the average student or professional to bet on college sports. In general, the attitude towards sports gambling among students seems to be pretty ambivalent.

"It's just for fun," LSA senior Rob Lampman said. "It's not anything where people are going to make a living on it."

"I don't think it's a big deal at all," Fine added. "It's harmless."

Texas murder trial:
just a blame game

This week, a jury handed down the verdict that Andrea Pia Yates, the Texas housewife who admitted to drowning her five children in her bathtub, was guilty of capital murder.

The jury's refusal to find Yates innocent by reason of insanity came as no shock. Juries are increasingly skeptical of insanity defenses. In Texas especially, it is difficult to convince 12 jurors to believe that a person who admittedly committed a crime should avoid jail time.

The case drew a considerable amount of controversy across the nation. Many feel that Yates, simply by reason of the severity of her crime, should be held accountable. They point out that the public would be less willing to show Yates any sympathy were she not a middle-class white woman, and accuse the media of bias in its coverage of the case.

Others feel that Yates was clearly insane at the time of the killings, and should not be held accountable for her actions. They argue that her history of severe postpartum depression and psychosis, combined with her calm behavior following the killings, show that Yates was unable at the time of the murders to tell right from wrong.

One common phenomenon on both sides of the debate has been to accuse Russell Yates, the children's father, of a certain level of guilt. Russell Yates, the public has been told, refused to give his wife the help she needed and prodded her into having more children, despite her obvious mental illness.

Terry Arnold, Andrea's best friend, testified at the trial that she had gone to Russell shortly before the killings and insisted that he get his wife treatment. She told him that the warning signs that something catastrophic could happen had grown too great. Yet he did nothing.

Many in the media have suggested that he is as culpable as his wife, accusing him of allowing the killings to take place through his negligence. These incidents have led the public to have little sympathy for him, as he undergoes trauma that the rest of us could barely fathom. While there is no question that Russell Yates could have handled the situation better than he did, it is entirely unfair to claim that he is as liable in the case as his wife, the actual murderer.

It is extremely common for people to deny the severity of a loved one's illness. It often takes time to accept that one's spouse, parent, or child, is insane. Many of us would have been hesitant to immediately accept that their life partner was capable of criminal acts.

Perhaps more importantly, not long before the killings, Russell Yates brought his wife to a psychiatrist and asked that she be placed on anti-psychotic medication. The doctor refused, saying that he saw no sign of severe mental unbalance.

He also regularly brought his own mother to their home to watch over the children, in an attempt to ease his wife's workload. Yet details like these are being glossed over by both the public and the media.

By all accounts, Russell Yates was a loving parent, and would never have placed his children in danger were he aware of it. To insist that he is the one to blame for his children's deaths is unimaginably cruel. He has paid the price for any negligence he committed many times over.

Full of disbelief

ERIN WALLACE

I don't know what to believe anymore.

Ever since the day I was born into parents who have brought me up in the Roman Catholic faith, I never questioned what was taught to me by my religion. I never questioned the Bible or what Jesus says through His Gospels. I've never had to question a priest's homily or the reading at the masses I attended every Sunday. I was baptized as a baby, made my first Penance, and I first Communion in second grade. As a sophomore in high school, I was confirmed into the adult Catholic faith. And last year I was thankful when I received an ample college scholarship from my hometown parish because of the volunteer work I did there.

I know that I believe in God. I read the Bible. I go to church every Sunday and feel as though I'm a good person. So what's a person like me doing in the middle of the massive Catholic sex scandal now brewing?

Several dioceses have come to be a four-letter word, thanks to the Church right now. The most recent example is in Palm Beach, Florida, where Rev. Ambrose Lotz, convicted recently of child molesting, is actually abusing a former student (not that 25 years ago, when he was the pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas, but more in Hannibal, Missouri).

But some of the abuse hit home right in my own archdiocese in Boston. Cardinal Bernard Law admitted he had evidence that various priests, John Geoghan has sexually abused children for years, but he still allowed him to continue to preach anyway. There have been more than just people that have come forward with claims that Geoghan abused them.

And that was only two editorials one that appeared in The Boston Herald and another in the Metro West Daily News who has the same parent company as the Herald were printed by the editorial board that insist Cardinal Law should step down from his position because he can no longer expect anyone to accept his authority on moral issues," according to whdh.com.

Once again, I come back to the point that I don't know what to believe. The awful scandal and abuse the Church, in religion is experiencing is downright awful, and I don't know what to do about it. I feel lost. Hurt. Betrayed. I thought priests were supposed to be good and honest people, ones that will organize youth group trips, greet you after mass and come to dinner at your house as my parish priests often did with my family. Priests listen to our confessions and act as a guide when you're feeling lost. Now I see respected priests screwing around with their jobs and not fulfilling their duties, and I wonder why I'm even a part of this. Everything that has been going on with the church lately, contradicts eighteen years of believing, loving and worshiping God. Now, of what I've been taught makes sens anymore, and I need guidance.

It's like I'm thinking in circles. Every time I think about this dilemma, I end up coming up with more questions and still don't have any answers. What make it worse is that I don't know if there are any answers or where they're going to come from if there are any.

I guess I'll just keep praying, talking and wondering about what I should do. There's a special seventh prayer I like to recite to myself often: "God, grant me the serenity to accept the things I can not change, the courage to change the things I can and the wisdom to know the difference."

I really don't know what to believe anymore.

Privacy versus safety:
The debate is not an easy one

ERIC MARTIGNETTI

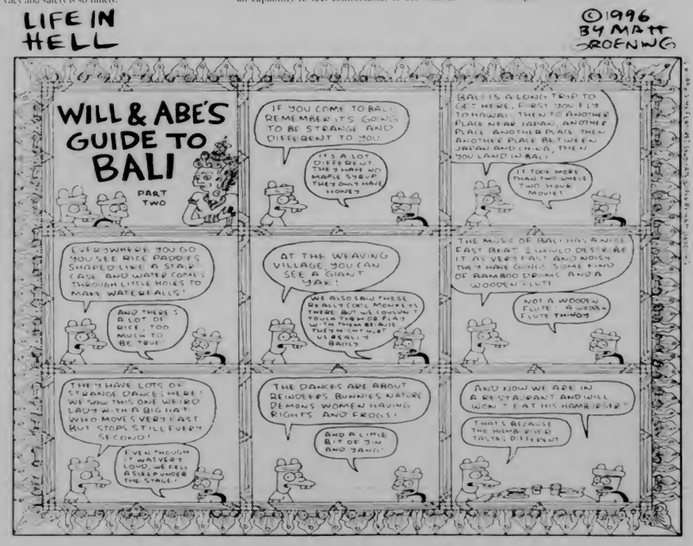
I was watching Law and Order Wednesday night, and, not surprisingly, I found myself in the throngs of an ethical dilemma. Such mental provocation is a trademark of the show, one of the longest running and, in my mind, best dramas ever. Nevertheless, I was particularly inspired by this specific episode.

I won't bore you with the gist of the plot, but the main motive for the murder centered on a debate between privacy and safety. As the episode progressed, each character weighed the pros and cons of this timely debate, and each time the characters were able only to complicate the issue. Even the normally willfully opinionated Jack McCoy was flummoxed by the moral quandary. Despite a conviction, the show ended in a shade of gray and left the viewer to render the true verdict. So I began thinking. Scary, I know.

Although the priorities of privacy and safety are inextricably and perpetually in conflict, the debate over which of these priorities is more valuable has been magnified since Sept. 11 and rightfully so. The attacks of Sept. 11 were an assault on both privacy and safety; they were a grave violation of respect. Such ruthless assailment of our beliefs inevitably causes us to question our beliefs, maybe even doubt them. Just as the attacks tore down the foundations of the towers, they also dismantled the foundation of our faith and beliefs. It is because we ourselves are unsure of either of these that the debate between privacy and safety is so timely.

The argument for privacy is that privacy equals freedom. When our privacy is invaded, we lose all that is our own. Everyone has some aspect of their life that they share with no one, not even those closest to them. The thought that a complete stranger could know something you don't even want a best friend knowing is frightening.

Privacy is the pillar of any society. Without a minimal amount of privacy, society becomes a pack of fearful wolves fending for scraps and not caring that some wolf might get hurt in the scavenger hunt. When trust is breached, we lose all ability to communicate freely, to act responsibly, or to care for others. We become an "every-person-for-themselves" society. Even a simple act of trust like opening canned food becomes an exercise in fear. From this vantage point, privacy breeds trust; thus, it is a crucial part of our society.



The argument for safety is that safety equals protection. When safety is violated, we forego comfort. Being safe is something that many take for granted. The idea that a total stranger could break into your house or pick the lock on your car is unnerving. Safety is the buttress of any society. Without a modicum of safety, society becomes a group of paranoid conspiracy theorists, fearing that everyone is out to get them and not knowing who is the real enemy.

Again, a violation of safety is equivalent to a violation of trust. When trust is infringed upon, we lose all capability to feel comfortable, to act without worry and to trust others. Again, such a scenario creates a "survival of the fittest" mentality. Just leaving our car doors unlocked or leaving our front doors open becomes a test of nerves. Again, from this perspective, safety translates to trust. Hence, it is a vital aspect of our society.

Personally, I am more inclined to care about safety. After all, my private life is really not that interesting. (No, I mean really not that interesting.) Nevertheless, I do have secret thoughts or activities that I would rather not divulge. (No, intravenous drug use is not one of those activities). Even if I don't value privacy over safety, I can at least see the point of people who do. This is why the debate is so complex and so confusing. Everyone is likely to put a higher price on either privacy or safety. I'm about a 60-40, safety-privacy kind of guy. For some public figures, however, the stakes are extremely high. They may be 80-20, privacy-safety people. There is no doubt that we need both privacy and safety. The degree to which we need each of them, though, is highly volatile and subjective.

So, I really haven't resolved much here. We need both privacy and safety in order to function. The Law and Order episode ended with the statement, "It seems that when we are forced to choose between safety and privacy, we end up losing both." Maybe this is absolutely true; maybe it is completely false. But in the ongoing debate between privacy and safety, it is certainly something to think about.

The value of our degrees

SCOTT KANE

I remember I first heard Chancellor Williams talk of increasing the value of our UMass degree. It was at the freshman convocation, when I had to attend as a Resident Assistant. She spoke of Alumni networks and of now "famous" Alumni (in her eyes any way) who were somehow mysteriously increasing the value of our degrees. She spoke incessantly about the "UMass family."

Often at UMass, I hear that Bill Cosby and Jack Welch went here, as if that was an indication of the quality of the University. A very familiar sight to anyone who has surfed the Internet on the campus's network is the UMass Web page for inside the University. On there, you will find almost exclusively UMass tooting its own horn. You'll see where such and such has published a book or gotten an award, or better yet, where the UMass name was mentioned obscurely in some news source somewhere. Are those the types of things that increase the value of our degrees? The administration don't.

I am experienced enough to understand that the University is not solely an educational institution. It's a lot of things, but primarily it's just that: an educational institution. It seems easy for me to see that a good university is a university that does a good job at what it does, educating. Increasing the value our UMass degrees equals increasing the quality of our education.

The problem with most of the population at UMass is that they have been here since they were freshman. They have assimilated overenrolled classes, lectures with 400 people and obscene lines as normal. They don't realize how hard they are getting screwed.

That is not my case. I transferred here as a junior from the largest community college in the state, Springfield Technical. After my first few weeks here, I hated the place so much so that I drove to UMass Boston to talk with the math department about the possibility of transferring. He told me that, as a math major, there was nowhere else in the state where I should be other than UMass Amherst. I stayed here because it was the easiest thing to do and because I wanted my degree to be from the state's flagship university. I now see that decision as one of the biggest mistakes of my life. I am sincerely disgusted with UMass and my affiliation with it.

I am positive that every single person reading this can think of at least one teacher, and probably many more, they have had here who was horrible. This is the type of teacher who everybody knew should not be teaching a class. Disorganized, incoherent, unclear and sloppy. I constantly hear of teachers like this. The fault lies in the administrators. They are the ones that allow these people to go on "teaching." They disrupt and damage the education of the students, the people who make UMass possible. Increasing the value of our education would mean hiring educators to teach classes and getting rid of those who aren't. It does not matter how smart a professor is or the quality of his or her research that you, as a student, could never understand anyway. What I want in a teacher is ability to convey ideas to students. I don't care about anything else.

Another major problem with an education at UMass is that it is largely a random collection of classes, a crapshoot to see what classes are open or what teachers are good. This semester, the available General Education biology classes to me are appallingly useless and boring. Students play this game every semester, and instead of taking classes they might be interested in, they take classes in which they can enroll and "just get through it." In my opinion, that is an abhorrent attitude towards life or school, but at UMass, it's normal. Even when you are lucky enough to get into a class, often times the academic standards are atrocious.

The University is part of a statewide system, and it's redundant and inefficient for it to perform the role of a community college. To keep the standards high, students who do poorly should be kicked out easier. It should not be possible to fail every single class you have and return for another semester, but it is at UMass. These people make the university more congested and cost the most in resources. Letting these slackers get a degree from UMass certainly doesn't increase the value of mine.

I understand the Chancellor's point of view that having a famous university equals a good university. It is about public relations. However, I have this question for the Chancellor: Do you want UMass to look like a good school, or do you want UMass to be a good school? What is the role of UMass in the Commonwealth? I think UMass is primarily a place for the citizens of Massachusetts to come to be educated. A quality education will produce quality people and an educated workforce. It is a better way of increasing the value of our degrees if employers continually recognize that UMass graduates are quality employees. A quality education will produce more people like Jack Welch, and the public relations will take care of themselves. In my mind, what the public thinks of UMass is more strongly connected with what they see out of most of its graduates, not the exceptional and advertised few.

In a letter from Chancellor Williams, Williams alludes to the construction of the new School of Management building as a sign of hope. In plain English, that is a load of crap. The correlation between a new physical structure on campus and hope of better days is vague and inappropriate. Administrators are not employed to hope. The truth is all around us. I see an educational system that is failing. It was failing before there were budget cuts, and now it will get worse. The question is what are you, as a student or an administrator, going to do about it?

Wrestlemania, "Tough Enough"

The biggest wrestling event of the year is almost upon us, so how come this year's Wrestlemania just seems like any other pay-per-view showing? Maybe because the build up and line-up is sub par compared to years past. Anyway, since Wrestlemania is "supposed" to be the biggest event of the year, here is the official preview.

The Rock vs. Hulk Hogan- "The dream match" will probably surprise people and actually be a decent match, since both of them will have their working boots on. It will probably be Hogan's best match in years, which isn't saying much. Pick: The Rock

Triple H vs. Chris Jericho- WWF Title Match: The buildup to this has been worse than any Wrestlemania Title Match in recent history. Triple H, trying to avenge the injury of his dog as the main event angle, is weak. If Booker Kurt (that's me) was in charge, Stephanie would have "really" been pregnant, not with Triple H's baby, but with Jericho's. Now there's an angle. This should be a good match, maybe a great one. Pick: Triple H

Ric Flair vs. The Undertaker- In contrast to the other matches, this has actually received some solid buildup. Too bad the match has little hope of being any good. These two just don't seem like good opponents for each other. After jobbing to Maven at "Royal Rumble" and The Rock at "No Way Out," there is no way Undertaker loses another PPV match, especially to a part time wrestler. Pick: Undertaker

Steve Austin vs. Scott Hall- Again, if Booker Kurt were in charge, the buildup to this match would have been different. How about an angle where the two challenge each other to a game of "Flip Cup" (since they are both big drinkers)? Of course, since Hall is the heel, when he loses, he attacks Austin and puts him through the flip cup table. I'd book Shawn Michael's to make his return and cost Austin the match, setting up a Austin-Michael's feud (makes sense since Michael's last match where he reinjured his back was against Austin). Then again, what do I know? I'm not as good as that fine WWF writing team Pick: Austin

In Other Matches: It's a shame that the WWF is wasting their best wrestler, Kurt Angle, in a match with Kane. Hopefully, he will at least be put over. RVD winning the Intercontinental Title should happen, and better happen. However, who knows? With the most recent shoddy booking, anything could happen. As far as the other matches go, it's nothing but filler.

MTV and the WWF have collaborated again after the hugely popular and successful show "Tough Enough," which took two pro-wrestler wannabes and made their dreams come true by offering them a WWF development contract. After over two months of diligent training and proving themselves to superstars Al Snow, Jackie, Tazz, and Tori, Maven and Nidia were selected out of a group that was once 14. Since then, Maven debuted at his first pay-per-view at the Royal Rumble, where he eliminated heavy favorite, The Undertaker, and has since gone on to win, lose and regain the Hardcore Championship. Nidia has had limited television time, but is continuing to train.

"Tough Enough 2" started last week with 14 new competitors. As this eclectic group of personalities, skill levels and body types go through the training process, they will have as guides and mentors WWF stars Al Snow, Bob "Hardcore" Holly, Chavo Guerrero Jr. and Ivory, as well as, whatever WWF stars come along the way to inspire and encourage.

Favorites include jock lake, body builder Anni, basketball goddess Linda, the native New Englander Matt, who is a massive beast at 6'10 and close to 300 pounds of muscle and seems like possibly the best and bet, even the favorite. He is also the complete opposite of Maven, a true heavyweight. Of course, last year many favorites ended up dropping out for personal and health reasons, so it's pretty much impossible to say who is going to win. The only way to find out is to see "who is Tough Enough."

Josh Hartnett + Ben Affleck + Pearl Harbor = crap

Mariah Carey in Glitter. Could it get any worse?

By Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While Hollywood's most elite are hobnobbing and receiving little, gold statues at the brand-new Kodak Theatre, across town in a function room at a Holiday Inn, another award ceremony is taking place, (dis)honoring the worst films to come out in the past year.

The Razzies!

Well, maybe I over exaggerate, but the Razzies, more formerly known as The Golden Raspberry Awards, point out the worst of the worst in film of the past year. Don't get the wrong idea: The Razzies aren't a list of movies that some people loved and some people hated (i.e. The Lord of the Rings). They're just plain, awful movies, lacking any positive attributes to them.

Here now is the list of this year's 2001 Golden Raspberry Award nominations (which are accurate selections), with a little added, extra commentary.

Driven
Freddy Got Fingered
Glitter
3000 Miles to Graceland

Driven could have been decent, but got stalled due to Sly Stallone and his script: Freddy...was perhaps the most offensively boring movie I've ever seen; I didn't expect anything from Glitter in the first place, so I wasn't bowled over when it was complete trash (yes, I saw it); Who wants to see Kevin Costner play a sadistic killer dressed as Elvis? Not many, as told by 3000 Miles...poor box office; And Pearl Harbor was a valid effort but got too caught up in wanting to be the next Titanic.

Ben Affleck,
Pearl Harbor
Tom Green,
Freddy Got Fingered
Kevin Costner,
3000 Miles to Graceland
Keanu Reeves,
Sweet November and Hardball
John Travolta,
Domestic Disturbance and Swordfish

True, Keanu Reeves was only playing himself in both of the movies he is nominated for, as was Tom Green, but I don't think Travolta was worthy of being heaped in here. Ben Affleck gets an "A" for effort in Pearl, and thus the title of Worst Actor must be given to The King, Kevin Costner.

Worst Actress of 2001
Mariah Carey,
Glitter
Penelope Cruz,
Blow, Captain Corelli's Mandolin and Vanilla Sky
Angelina Jolie,
Lara Croft: Tomb Raider and Original Sin
Jennifer Lopez,
Angel Eyes and The Wedding Planner
Charlize Theron,
Sweet November

Mariah Carey's not even an actress, so she is automatically ruled out of this category; I could never say anything bad about Angelina Jolie (especially since she did some nice nude scenes in Sin); I can never understand a thing that comes out of Cruz's mouth, and two out of the three movies listed were painful to sit through. But, boy oh boy, do I revel in this moment when I can say that I'm glad I'm not the only one who thought Jennifer Lopez was among this year's crème de la crème of crap actresses. Muah hah hah!

Max Beesley,
Glitter
Charlton Heston,
Cats & Dogs, Planet of the Apes and Town & Country
Burt Reynolds,
Driven
Sylvester Stallone,
Driven
Rip Torn,
Freddy Got Fingered

I will never be able to erase from my memory the image of Rip Torn's flabby, old butt mooned at the camera in Freddy..., but even so, it's a tie for the worst between Burt Reynolds and the gun-toting Charlton Heston. My gut drives me towards Reynolds, though, because he's just a cocky, arrogant jerk (on and off camera), and that's reason enough.

Worst Supporting Actress of 2001
Drew Barrymore,
Freddy Got Fingered
Courtney Cox,
3000 Miles to Graceland
Julie Haggerty,
Freddy Got Fingered
Goldie Hawn,
Town & Country
Estella Warren,
Planet of the Apes and Driven

They're all pretty lousy in these films, but at least Warren is nice to look at. Whoever wins, they deserve it.

Worst Remake or Sequel of 2001
Crocodile Dundee in L.A.
Jurassic Park 3
Pearl Harbor
Planet of the Apes
Sweet November

Dundee was pretty bad, but did you honestly expect anything worthwhile? And, pardon my naivety, but what, exactly, was Pearl Harbor a remake of? Tora, Tora, Tora? Not buying it. Let's give the honors to Jurassic, a franchise that has definitely lost its bite and is due to go extinct.

Worst Director of 2001
Michael Bay,
Pearl Harbor
Peter Chelsom,
Town & Country
Tom Green,
Freddy Got Fingered
Vondie Curtis Hall,
Glitter
Renny Harlin,
Driven

Peter Chelson reigns supreme among these fellow candidates, because he has had two strikes this year, one for the aforementioned Town but also for the overlooked snooze-fest Serendipity. I think it might be awhile before he helms another movie. Or, at least, I hope.

Worst Screenplay of 2001
Driven
Freddy Got Fingered
Glitter
3000 Miles to Graceland

They're all tasteless and tiresome, but which one is the head honcho here? It's a tough call. But this award calls for the worst "writing," paying special attention to the actual script. In that case, the worst storyline and dialogue, regardless of acting, directing and other components, would fall on the shoulders of 3000 Miles, a thoroughly uninteresting and uninspired movie.

Worst On-Screen Couple of 2001
Ben Affleck or Josh Hartnett and Kate Beckinsale,
Pearl Harbor
Mariah Carey and Her Cleavage,
Glitter
Tom Green and Any Animal He Abuses,
Freddy Got Fingered
Burt Reynolds and Sylvester Stallone,
Driven
Kurt Russell or Kevin Costner and Courtney Cox,
3000 Miles to Graceland

Need I mention further how tremendously stupid all these movies were? Front-runner among them, though, was Freddy..., and while Green may find it a real side-splitter to give a cow sexual pleasures, no one else found it funny. There's a line to be drawn between the humor of American Pie, which is good-natured fun, and the kind of "jokes" that mistreats nature.

What about the Chaucer rip-off, A Knight's Tale? Or the totally horrific Bubble Boy, as a remake of Travolta's The Boy In the Plastic Bubble? Are the folks at the Razzies forgetting the bad taste left in their mouths after Bandits and Riding In Cars with Boys? Even though there were a handful of terrible movies this year, 2001 was, overall, a fabulous time at the multiplexes. The Golden Raspberry Awards, though, thankfully recognize the complete filth in film.

The Golden Raspberry Award winners will be announced on Saturday, Mar. 23 on its Web site, www.razzies.com.

Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may turn someone against you without even knowing it today, simply by paying him or her a little less attention than you should.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You're in the mood to break the rules today – at least in a way that satisfies your wanderlust without getting you into serious trouble.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Someone may try to get you to behave very much out of character today. Believe it or not, there's something sinister going on here.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – This is a good day to work on your own receptiveness and sensitivity. Someone will soon come to you and require a little more understanding.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may take things far more personally than you should; guard against becoming emotionally vulnerable or raw. Take things at face value.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may come close to wounding someone else's pride today without even knowing it. When you realize what the offense is, quickly make amends.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You needn't worry unnecessarily about something that is showing no signs of going sour. Focus on the positive all day long.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You needn't worry unnecessarily about something that is merely a product of your own imagination. Let it go and move forward.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You'll find yourself in something of a struggle over who will get credit for something that was really a joint effort. Don't be selfish.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Seek out someone with the same interests and you'll enjoy a new kind of companionship that otters more than you've been getting for quite a while.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Something casual may develop into something more serious, and you'd better be on top of it lest you lose your heart unwittingly.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You can see an idea come to fruition very quickly today, provided you get an early start and talk to all involved as if they were your equals.

Adarj Stojanowski (No. 18) hit a game-winning two-run bloop single to right field in the eighth inning of yesterday's 8-6 win over Sacred Heart.

Florida trip preceeded by three straight victories

In the middle of March in New England, playing baseball is usually impossible.

However, the Massachusetts men's baseball team took advantage of the unseasonably warm weather yesterday afternoon at Harbor Yard in Bridgeport, Conn., knocking off Sacred Heart 8-6.

Sacred Heart	6

With the win, the Minutemen improved to 4-2 (0-0 Atlantic 10) on the year, while the Pioneers dropped to 5-4.

The game remained close throughout, but Adam Stojanowski's bloop single to right field in the top of the eighth inning proved to be the difference, as his two RBIs broke a 6-6 tie.

Stojanowski's hit was just one of 16 base knocks UMass would collect, as it overcame a Sacred Heart three-run seventh to pull out the victory.

Early on, the Pioneers notched a run in each of the first two innings on Maroon and White first-time starter Mike Crane. However, the Minutemen tied it up in the top of the third when outfielder Jason Twomley went yard over the right-centerfield fence.

It was not only the first career homer for the freshman, but was also the first hit of his collegiate career.

In the fifth, UMass overcame another deficit (3-2) by tallying three runs. Centerfielder Mike Kulak and Stojanowski both tripled to lead the rally, while Cullan Maumus picked up an RBI bunt single of his own.

The final run of the frame came on a balk from Sacred Heart pitcher Dan Scott, as eventual loser Rob Duell would soon replace him.

After the Minutemen picked up another run in the sixth, the Pioneers came back with three runs in the seventh to tie things up yet again. Brian Rojee and Eric Mittelstadt (three hits on the afternoon) were the two main instigators of the comeback, as they totaled a two-run double and an RBI single, respectively, to go along with two walks in the inning.

After Stojanowski's heroics in the eighth inning, Scott Ratliff came in for UMass and pitched two scoreless innings for his first save of the year. In the ninth, he ran into trouble and loaded the bases with two outs, but he got out of the jam by striking out Brian Moir to douse any chance of a Sacred Heart win.

Now, the Maroon and White will travel down to Brandenton, Fla. for the start of a busy spring break that involves nine games in nine days.

Northern Illinois, Wright State, Vermont, Illinois and Dartmouth are all on the agenda in Brandenton, while the Minutemen will also sneak in a contest against Florida in Gainesville on Mar. 19.

The No. 6 Gators will be an especially tough test for UMass, as they have posted a 15-3 record and are coming off two wins over the College of Charleston in which they scored over 20 runs in both outings.

Mark Kiger leads Florida at the plate with a .507 batting average, seven home runs and 30 RBIs, while Alex Hart (5-0, 0.58 ERA) is a force to be reckoned with on the mound.

After the six games in the Sunshine State, the Minutemen travel north to Richmond to begin the Atlantic 10 portion of their schedule with three games against the Spiders.

Gymnastics to compete in final home meet ever

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It could have ended on a different note.

With Navy, Penn State, Temple, Yale and Massachusetts Institute of Technology being the last home meet of the season, and then the 2002 Senior Night, it was going to be special for the Minutemen women's gymnastics team, no matter what.

But now Tuesday's meet has become an entirely different, which included the announcement that it was senior night Saturday is likely to be the last home meet for the Minutemen. Ever.

Obviously, Coach Dave Kuzara's team was the one affected by the news Tuesday.

"I think [the news] is pretty much a shock," Kuzara said. "People have come to expect it here.

There was some mild [concern] about the coaches of the teams that were being considered [for certification]," Kuzara said, but no one expected it to actually happen to the program as it has posted a 96-67 record since coming to UMass in 1994.

"We assumed we'd take a hit as far as scholarships and budget cuts," the ninth-year coach said. The amount of money it takes to run an sport isn't significant."

The news came at a tough time for the Minutemen, who are coming off their strongest meet of the season, 195.000-192.2350 loss at Rutgers one week ago. UMass recorded season-best scores on vault, uneven bars, and floor exercise, while posting its second-highest mark on the balance beam.

Highlights of the meet included junior Megan Donoghue's all-around performance – her second best of the year – and senior Tracy Chow's performance on the vault. The Silver Spring, Md. native captured the title with a season-high 9.775.

"Tracy has been instrumental in our success this year," Kuzara said of his only senior.

Juniors Jen Grendon and Katie Teft also impressed at Rutgers. Grendon earned second on the floor exercise with a 9.850, while Teft won the uneven bars with a 9.925. The performance was the former Olympic alternate's (1996) third time earning a score over 9.90 on the bars this season.

The quality performances and season-best total team score should have propelled the Maroon and White toward the final few weeks with added confidence and determination.

"We are just starting to come together as a team," Kuzara said.

But then the athletes ran into www.umassathletics.com Tuesday and saw the news.

"That's how they found out," Kuzara said. "That's [usually] their homepage."

It isn't as if the coach knew the decision had been made much earlier than that.

"I was notified 24 minutes before the press release [went up]," the University of Michigan alum said.

It comes as no surprise that the decision has greatly affected the team's practices.

"To find out with two weeks to go in a season is a pretty dramatic event," Kuzara said. "It's been tough for them to focus during practice, but I think it will come together Saturday."

As for the meet, it will be the third contest between Yale and UMass this season. The teams split the first two contests with neither event being decided by more that .01 points.

"The competition between our two programs is going to be the main competition," Kuzara said, also pointing out that M.I.T.'s squad is a little lower in ability.

The meet will also be an alumni weekend for the women's gymnastics team.

"Over 50 gymnastics alumni will be there," Kuzara said. "It's going to be an incredible event."

He was also happy for the chance to compete in Boyden Gymnasium one last time.

"We are glad we have this opportunity to compete at home," Kuzara said. "With the events of the week, it will be nice to be in front of family and friends."

Not that the Minutemen are giving up hope for next week's Atlantic 10 Championships.

"We intend on winning the Atlantic 10 in two weeks," Kuzara said.

Nor have they given up on the program.

"We've tried to maintain our respect and focus," he said. "These kids were recruited in good faith. We don't feel like the fight is done."

Tired Minutewomen collapse in 2nd half

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team dropped its first game of the season yesterday, falling 10-6 at the hands of the University of New Hampshire.

UMass	6

Senior Meg Clavin and freshman junior Jessie Gorszkowski each tallied a hat trick for the Wildcats, who picked up their first win of the season and their second straight win over the Minutewomen.

UNH never trailed on the afternoon and was able to hold UMass (3-1) to a season-low six goals en route to the victory. The 10 goals allowed also marks the first time in 2002 that the Minutewomen have given up more than six goals.

"It wasn't our day. We did not play our game, and our game is a team game," said UMass head coach Phil Barnes. "That's how they beat us; they were the better team today."

For the second consecutive game, the Minutewomen went into halftime tied, but unlike Saturday's match with Harvard, UMass was unable to pick up the early momentum and allowed four of the first five goals of the half to fall behind, 7-4 with 24 minutes left.

"We were physically and mentally tired from this past week," said Barnes of his team's second half struggles. "The only way to overcome that is to focus harder mentally and really use that to fight through how you're feeling. We did not do that, and that's the difference in the game."

Gorszkowski scored a pair of goals less than a minute apart at the start of the half before Tracey Drown pulled one back for the Minutewomen to make the score 5-4. Drown took a pass from junior captain Jada Emery just outside the left post and bounced a shot past Danielle Martin in the UNH goal to pull UMass within one. The goal was the sophomore's second of the game and of the season.

Twelve and a half minutes into the first half, Martin scored the first goal of her UMass career, also off an Emery feed. The Nashua, N.H. native, scored 16 times for Towson last season before transferring to Amherst and donning the maroon and white.

However, the Wildcats went back up by two just 12 seconds later through Sue Yund. She picked up a loose ball off the restart and raced the length of the field before beating Cyndi Doyle in the UMass cage.

"We knew about Yund, and overall, I think we did a pretty decent job on her," said Barnes. "She only scored two goals, but they were in the first couple of minutes of each half and that hurt. Clavin had a great day and so did Gorszkowski for UNH. We just didn't step up today."

After allowing a free position goal to Clavin a minute later, Doyle was replaced in net by sophomore Emma Butcher. But the change did not pay off, and the Minutewomen found themselves behind 10-5 when Doyle reentered the contest nine minutes later.

"We needed to get Cyndi refocused," said Barnes. "She played well upon going back in."

Jada Emery notched a pair of goals and a pair of assists on the afternoon to leap over fellow junior Lydia Robinson to take the team lead in scoring with 10 points (six goals, four assists). But only two other Minutewomen scored on the day to highlight their offensive struggles.

"We needed the attack to work together as a group and for the to step up, and that didn't happen today," Barnes said. "The difference in our three other games is that there always seemed to be someone else new stepping up, and that didn't happen today."

Doyle and Butcher combined for 11 saves in the UMass cage, while Martin had a fine afternoon, stopping 12 shots for the Wildcats.

The Minutewomen return to action on Saturday afternoon in the nation's capital when they take on George Washington in both teams' first taste of Atlantic 10 action.

Finalists announced in search for chancellor

By Jennifer Eastwood

John Lombardi

Elizabeth Capaldi

William Hogan

William E. Hogan II, John V. Lombardi and Elizabeth D. Capaldi were announced on Mar. 21 as the three finalists for the chancellor position at the University of Massachusetts.

A search committee of 21 members comprised of Board of Trustee members, alumni and other assorted UMass office heads chose the finalists. The committee, given the task of finding such a candidate, has been on its pursuit since last July, just months following former Chancellor David Scott's statement declaring his plans to step down from the position.

"We believe these candidates possess the array of skills needed to lead our flagship campus," Grace K. Fey, search committee chairman, as well as the chairman of the UMass Board of Trustees, stated in a recent press release. "These finalists have emerged from a rich and diverse pool of candidates."

The chancellor interviews were held on Feb. 14 and 15, in which eight candidates were considered. This group had been previously singled out of a pool of approximately 50 possibilities. With the aid of Isaacson, a firm specializing in searches for leaders of organizations, businesses and educational institutions, background checks, Internet searches and preliminary interviews initially siphoned the group.

Jon Laubinger, UMass Student Trustee and the only student on the search committee, was unable to attend the official meeting that resulted in the decision of the three finalists due to the fact that the meeting was held during spring break. However, Laubinger's vote for the possible appointees, like each committee member's, was included in the decision.

"The student voice was represented, and I think people will be very happy with these candidates," Laubinger asserted. "It didn't make a difference [if I attended the meeting over spring break] because they [other committee members] already knew where I stood on it. It was more a formality."

Laubinger expressed his utmost confidence in each of the three candidates, claiming that each possesses the qualifications to steer the University through its most recent financial hardships.

Hogan, he began, is someone who has been extremely successful in both the academic and business realms.

CEO of the investment firm the Hogan Company of Minneapolis, Hogan was elected to the Board of Regents at the University of Minnesota in 1993 and re-elected in 1999. He currently serves as the board's chairman.

"He's an amazing man," Laubinger said. "He's the type of person who can go out and talk with the politicians and snooze them, which is something we need here with the financial situation."

Hogan received his B.S. and Ph.D. degrees from Oklahoma State University and his master's from Southern Methodist University.

Lombardi, director of the Center for Studies in the Humanities and Social Sciences at the University of Florida and also the former president of the Univ. of Fla., was dubbed by Laubinger a "very charming" individual who is known for driving about campus in his beat-up, old pick-up truck.

"John Lombardi has already done at the University of Florida what we want done at UMass," Laubinger further explained. "In his ten years, he brought great change to the University. It went from a place of low morale to a place where everybody there wanted to be there."

With his experience in rejuvenating the Univ. of Fla., Lombardi spoke to the UMass Board of Trustees as a consultant earlier this year, prior to the narrowing of the chancellor search. Lombardi, who received his bachelor's degree from Pomona College and his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees from Columbia University, has worked as a historian, teacher, administrator and author, specializing in Latin American Studies, international business, computer literacy and software evaluation.

Elizabeth D. Capaldi, current provost and psychology professor at the State University of New York at Buffalo, worked with Lombardi during her term as provost of Univ. of Florida from July 1998 to Nov. 1999.

"[Capaldi] was actually Lombardi's protege at the University of Florida and was there for the rise of the University," Laubinger said.

Al Qaeda will be tried for crimes through military tribunal

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Al Qaeda and other terrorists will get a fair trial by military tribunals, the Department of Defense said last week.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld announced the rules and composition of judicial military commissions that will try al Qaeda detainees and captured Taliban fighters last Thursday. The military tribunals are per the November 2001 order of President George W. Bush. Rumsfeld said the trials would be fair and impartial.

Rumsfeld explained the reasoning behind the tribunals.

"We are a nation of laws. We have been attacked by lawless terrorists. The manner in which we conduct trials under military commissions will speak volumes about our character as a nation, just as the manner in which we were attacked speaks volumes about the character of our adversaries," Rumsfeld said. "We have made every reasonable effort to establish a process that is just; one that protects both the rights of the defendant to a fair trial, but also protects the rights of the American people to their security and to live as they were meant to live, in freedom, and free of terrorists."

"Let there be no doubt that these commissions will conduct trials that are honest, fair and impartial," Rumsfeld added. "While ensuring just outcomes, they will also give us the flexibility we need to ensure the safety and security of the American people in the midst of a difficult and dangerous war."

The tribunals will be made up of three to seven military officers or civilians with special military rank, and two or three alternates. Many rights of the accused present in criminal trials will be protected, the Pentagon said. Military defense counsel will be provided for the accused. The accused may choose their own counsel; another military officer who is a judge advocate or a civilian attorney chosen from a pool of approved lawyers. The defendant and counsel will be able to see copies of the charges in their native language in advance of the trial.

Also, the accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty and may be found guilty only when commission members are convinced of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The accused can refuse to testify during trial, be able to obtain witnesses and documents to use in his defense. There is also a double jeopardy protection and plea agreements.

"We've been working for some four months, and what we announced today are the rules of procedure under which they will work, which I think will ensure a fair trial," deputy secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz said on PBS's "News Hour with Jim Lehrer" Thursday. "But also deal with very special conditions under which some of these trials may have to take place with the use of classified information, the use of information collected from the battlefield.

"But the only people that would be subjected to these commissions are non-US citizens who were connected to al-Qaeda or other terrorist movements, guilty of serious terrorist crimes against the United States," Wolfowitz said.

Wolfowitz commented on the fairness of the trials during a CNN interview.

"The defense, if they want to — the defendant, if he wants to, can hire a civilian attorney, as well as a military attorney. I think we have seen in our own military court system that military judges are perfectly capable of dealing fairly and thoroughly with the issues in previous military commissions. We have had these before in history, and I think they can handle things fairly," Wolfowitz said. "I think if people will not deal with the theories they developed when this was first announced four months ago and look at the rules that are actually published today, I think they will see that this is a fair procedure."

Amherst holds town elections

By Melissa Hammel
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The town of Amherst will be holding its annual elections this Tuesday for a number of positions including town meeting members.

The voting, which will begin at noon on March 26 and continue until 8:00 p.m., is open to all voters registered in the town of Amherst. Due to population changes as calculated with the federal census, some of the voting precincts effecting University of Massachusetts students have now been changed.

Voters registered in Cance, Melville, Emerson, James, Moore or Pierpont in the Southwest Living Area should vote as part of precinct four in the Bangs Community Center on 70 Boltwood Walk.

Students registered to vote in Coolidge, Crampton, John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Kennedy, Mackimmie, Patterson, Prince, Thoreau or Washington are registered in precinct 10 and should vote in the Hampden Dining Commons in Southwest.

The locations for all other areas of voting are in the following locations: Precinct one votes at the North Amherst Congressional Hall, precinct two at the North Fire Station, precinct three at the Immanuel Lutheran Church, precincts four and five at Bangs Community Center, precinct six at Fort River School, seven at Crocker Farm School, eight at Munson Memorial Library and precinct nine at the Wildwood School.

Although all of the polling places are handicapped accessible and accessible for the elderly those that have physical disabilities that prevent them from literally going to vote may vote by absentee ballot.

Other factors that allow for absentee ballot voting include absence from Amherst during the hours that the polls are open and a religious belief that prevents individuals from going to the polls.

Applications for absentee ballots must be made in writing with the voter's name and voting address, voter precinct, the address to which the ballot should be mailed out and the voter's signature.

Individuals who will be out of town must apply for the absentee ballot by today at noon and vote at the Town Clerk's office before polling hours on March 26. The Town Clerk's office hours are Monday through Friday from 8:00 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

In addition to the vote, the Town of Amherst also has year 2002 dog licenses that are available at the Central Services Counter in the Town Hall. State law requires every resident with a dog six months of age or older to have a license and a tag. To avoid having to pay a fine, the dog must be registered by June 1.

License fees are a flat fee of 12 dollars for male and female dogs or four dollars for dogs that are spayed or neutered. The dog must also have been vaccinated for rabies at the time of licensing and the owner must include proof of the vaccination.

If the owner is unable to produce the information in person he or she can mail the license fee, certificate of spaying or neutering, and rabies vaccination certificate along with a self addressed stamped envelope. The owner must also provide the dog's name, breed, color and age along with the information.

All certificates will be returned with a license and tag.

Protein diet information

Currently, more than one half of U.S. adults are overweight and nearly one quarter of the U.S. population is considered obese. While Americans fight the "Battle of the Bulge," many search for ways to shed those unwanted pounds. Many American adults and teenagers are on some sort of diet either to lose weight or to gain weight (i.e. bodybuilders).

High protein, low carbohydrate diets such as the Atkins, Zone, Protein Power, Sugar Busters and Stillman are among the best selling diet books available these days. These diets are all different in terms of what you can and cannot eat. Health professionals have become concerned with the safety and efficiency of these "revolutionary" diets.

Proteins are essential components of the human body. They are involved in numerous functions, ranging from the development of muscle tissue to the production of hormones, antibodies, and enzymes, which all have important roles in the body. The Recommended Daily Allowance for protein of high biological value protein has been set at 0.8 g/kg for the average adult. Pregnant women, children, people with certain diseases and elite athletes may require more. Most Americans actually ingest more protein than what their body requires.

Now to the case at point, what do I really need to know about high protein diets?

When it comes to weight loss, the principal is simple. Energy in should be less than energy out. You simply need to eat fewer calories and expend more.

High protein diets suggest that insulin is what causes you to become fat. Insulin is a growth hormone required for carbohydrate, fat and protein storage in the body. Its release is stimulated by carbohydrates and to a much lesser extent by protein. These diets suggest that too many carbohydrates cause you to gain weight by increasing the amount of insulin released, thus leading to increased body-fat storage. The basis behind these diets is that high protein and low carbohydrate intake will lower insulin levels, thereby lowering body-fat storage.

However, a variety of factors significantly lead to excessive insulin or insulin resistance in the body, two being obesity and lack of exercise. Reducing your caloric intake with a normal diet, losing weight, or increasing physical activity can all lower insulin levels in the body.

One of the main objectives of high protein diets is to limit your consumption of carbohydrates. Fruits, vegetables, legumes and grains all contain carbohydrates. All of these foods are great sources of vitamins, minerals, fiber and antioxidants. By limiting these sources, you may be increasing your risk for developing a vitamin or mineral deficiency, diverticulitis from lack of fiber, or cancer. Supplementing is not the answer. There are many nutrients in foods that are unknown. You cannot replace these with a pill.

High protein diets suggest that you consume most of your protein from animal sources. Animal meats contain a substantial amount of cholesterol and saturated fat. Diets high in saturated fat increase the production of LDL (bad) cholesterol, and lower your HDL (good) cholesterol. This could increase the risk of developing cardiovascular disease. These sources also contain a large amount of purines, leading to excessive uric acid in the body. Some people could develop

Germany

By Dan Atkinson
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON – Irene Holstein spent her adolescence like many other teenagers: going to school, hanging out with her friends and occasionally sneaking into the local movie theater.

However, her school was created to keep her from a prejudiced public school, some of her friends stopped talking to her and the movie theater's owners didn't restrict her because of her age, but because of her religion.

Holstein grew up as a Jew in pre-war Berlin before fleeing to America in 1939, only six weeks before Germany invaded Poland, beginning World War II. She discussed her youth and reactions upon returning to Berlin with 20 students in the College of Arts and Sciences on Tuesday night as part of Holocaust Education Week.

"I remember being 12 years old when Hitler became chancellor and watching him in a parade through Berlin," Holstein said. "All of a sudden, after that we were shut out. We couldn't go to movies, swimming pools or any public places."

However, because all of Germany's foreign embassies were located in Berlin, Hitler kept persecution to a minimum there to avoid international recognition, Holstein said.

After the window smashings, synagogue burnings and mass arrests of Kristallnacht in November 1938, Holstein's mother decided it was time to leave Berlin. Her father had already left for Holland.

"My father used to listen to Hitler from way back, and said that he believed him. That's why he left," Holstein said.

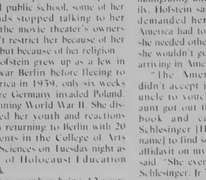
For Holstein, though, leaving was not as simple.

"The problem was not getting out, it was getting in somewhere," Holstein said.

The American consulate made immigrating difficult for her family, Holstein said. The consulate demanded her sponsors from America had to be relatives, and she needed other people to vouch she wouldn't go on welfare upon arriving in America.

"The American consulate didn't accept just my aunt and uncle to vouch for me, so my aunt got out the Boston phone book and called up every Messinger (Holstein's maiden name) to find someone to give an affidavit on my behalf," Holstein said. "She eventually got Arthur Messinger. It's father to do it."

Although Holstein, her mother and her grandmother all applied to come to the United States, Holstein was the only one cleared to enter the country. Her uncle sneaked back into Germany to plead their case.



"He came in by going in a restaurant which had one hall in Switzerland and the other half in Germany," Holstein said. "He begged them to put my mother and grandmother on the same number as me. They put my mother on because they thought I was too young to go alone, but they left my grandmother off. She died in Auschwitz."

However, Holstein's grandmother still wrote letters to her in Boston until mail ceased to come from Germany, she said. Holstein put the letters in her book, Irene: Chronicles of a Survivor.

"We could tell the letters were censored because each one had a different number in the corner," Holstein said. "But my grandmother would write around the censors."

Holstein said she has been back to Berlin several times, and she still holds affection for the city.

"When we go back now, we go to the opera, the theater – what we used to do when we were teenagers," she said.

Audience members thought Holstein brought an interesting viewpoint on the Holocaust.

"When we talk about survivors, we mainly talk about concentration camps," said CAS senior Inna Zinger. "She was talking from a perspective out side that. Although it was horrible, people had to live through it."

Mexico

By Edgar Pagaza
The Daily Aztec (San Diego St. U.)

(U-WIRE) SAN DIEGO – Spring Break is around the corner, and everyone on the San Diego State University campus seems to be asking the same question: "Where are you going?"

For some students in San Diego, their answer might be a little different than people at other universities. They're going to Mexico.

Thousands of San Diegan college students will head 30 miles south of Interstate 8 to party over the one-week break.

Tijuana is just one of the places in the country students will visit to get "wild and crazy."

However drinking excessively, acting rowdy and the consequences of those actions could all result in dangerous situations.

Physical therapy freshman Nick Brown knows the risks of going to Tijuana all too well.

Although Brown has been several times, he recalls an incident at Club Safari that he'll never forget.

"I woke up on the floor. I lost my shirt. I had puke all over myself. I had footprints on me, and there was no one at the club," Brown said.

Also, the Mexican police, especially the federales, have a notorious reputation in America for extorting tourists, particularly college students.

International business sophomore Robert Jackson said he is a testament to that. He has had several problems with the police in the past year.

"We were walking down the street and the cops grabbed us and started searching us," Jackson said.

The cops asked Jackson and his friends if they had any drugs because their eyes looked bloodshot. None of them did. Jackson and his friends had to give the cops $50 to let them go.

In a different incident, Jackson said he was pulled over for not wearing a seat belt. The cops asked him for his registration. Jackson wasn't able to find it and said he had to give the police $40.

Ruben Herrera, who works for the federal police in Tijuana, feels that the department has been viewed unfairly.

"We are only here to help the state police (in the battle against drugs)," Herrera said.

Although Herrera has only been working in Tijuana for one month, he said most of the corruption and extortion taking place in Mexico is coming from the municipal police.

"It is necessary for (tourists) to behave and not indulge in excesses so that they don't commit misdemeanors and other crimes. The local police will take advantage to get money out of them and extort them," Herrera said.

Manuel Ledezma, an agent of the municipal police, acknowledges that there have been cases of corruption within his department. However, he says that those cops don't work for the department any longer.

Ledezma also added that people can't generalize and think that every cop in Tijuana is corrupt.

"Just like there are good and bad people, there are good and bad cops," he said.

In addition, Ledezma emphasized that it is important for Americans to realize that cops are not always looking for their money. In fact, a lot of times it is the Americans who offer to pay off the cops if they have been disorderly and broken the law.

Tijuana has also been on heightened alert prompted by the recent death of one of Mexico's top drug kingpins and the arrest of his brother.

Last month, Ramon Felix-Arellano was shot down by police agents in Mazatlan. A little while later, another head of the cartel was caught. This time it was his brother, Benjamin Felix-Arellano. On Tuesday, there were three bodies found in Tijuana that are possibly linked to the drug cartel.

The Mexican government has increased security by adding more federal troops around the city. Police say it's because they fear a battle will take place to lead the Tijuana drug route to the United States.

The presence of more police is evident through the streets of Tijuana, especially in the downtown area. On every corner, federal agents stand with shotguns.

Ledezma said the most important thing to remember is to obey all the laws, especially when it comes to driving.

"If you are coming to have fun (and drink), then don't drive," Ledezma said.

expressing his assurance that she too would bring similar knowledge and experience in reviving campus morale.

As the psychology department head at Purdue University from 1983 to 1988, Capaldi has written an introductory psychology textbook and contributed to roughly 60 chapters, articles and books in psychology. She received her B.A. degree from the University of Rochester and her Ph.D. from University of Texas at Austin.

The final decision for Chancellor will be made upon President William Bulger making a candidate recommendation to the UMass Board of Trustees, in which the members will vote on approval of the proposal.

"We decided we'll definitely have a designated Chancellor by July 1," said Laubinger. "So that is the latest that Bulger can make his recommendation to the board. The board has the final say."

Texas area Playboy photographer accustomed to dissent on campuses

By Brandi Dean
The Lariat (Baylor U.)

(U-WIRE) WACO, Texas – About 15 Baylor University women have called in to set up appointments for the interviews and photographs necessary to be considered for one of the models in Playboy's "Women of the Big 12 Conference" spread, according to the Playboy photographer in town.

David Rams, a photographer for Playboy, spent Thursday morning doing various media promotions and did not start actual interviews until after 1 p.m., but during the morning he said the phone was ringing off the hook with questions about the process and requests for appointments.

Rams said the questions mainly dealt with issues of confidentiality, which he attributes in part to Baylor's stance on students posing for Playboy.

"I see [the administration's] right in having their opinion on what they feel is right," he said. "They have a right not to like it, just as a father has a right not to like his 19-year-old daughter posing for Playboy. But if that's what she wants to do, they shouldn't expel her for it."

Although the administration has not said students would be expelled or suspended, it has said both would be within the range of punishments, which has been a factor in at least one girl's decision not to pose for them. After hearing both Playboy and the 2003 Budweiser Women of the Big 12 Conference Swimsuit Calendar were looking for models from Baylor, Dawn Eminson called both publications but decided against posing for either.

"The [possibility of] censorship I was sort of worried about," said Eminson, a freshman, "but I was very concerned about being suspended or expelled. It played a role in my decision."

It was not, however, the only issue. Eminson said she would have considered posing for the clothed group shot, but the pay did not make it worth it, and she wasn't interested in posing nude.

"I don't feel comfortable doing that," she said. "It's just a personal thing. I don't care if anyone else does, I'm just not comfortable with that many people staring at me naked."

The religious issues that posing nude raises, such as whether it would be an appropriate expression of Baylor's Christian ideals, were not what persuaded Eminson against it, she said, and Rams said it was not one that had been raised by other students who called.

Because of the school's position on the magazine and because students are concerned with confidentiality, the location of the interviews was told only to women who called for an appointment. In other cities, Rams said he has seen many people protest the magazine's presence, but he doesn't mind.

"There are protesters at a lot of schools," he said, "and I always get along with them. I've taken them out to dinner before. I became really good friends with the protesters at one of the other schools. It was really funny because at the end of the day, when I was finished casting and they were finished protesting, they were coming up to the room and hanging out. They were from a church, and one of the guys gave me a Bible, and they baked us a cake and gave us some CDs, and we took them out to dinner.

Rams said unlike that of the protesters, the most common concern of women posing for Playboy is what people will think.

"Usually they're wondering about how their family is going to see this," he said. "And they all seem to want to know a little bit about previous girls, what's happened to them and has it caused any problems in their lives, like have they gone onto better things."

The answer to that question is generally up to the woman, Rams said. If she wants to do something with the experience, it's generally possible, but if not, people will forget about it.

gout as a result of this. Another drawback is that milk, a high calcium source, is often not warranted because it contains carbohydrates. Excessive animal protein leads to increased calcium excretion.

Women may be at risk of developing osteoporosis if the diet is maintained for a long period of time. High blood pressure can also result from a reduction in magnesium, calcium and potassium and an increase in sodium intake.

High protein diets work on the premise that they induce something known as ketosis. Individuals initially lose some weight within the first few days of restricting calorie intake. This is due to glycogen (carbohydrate storage) depletion, water and sodium losses, and ketosis. Glycogen depletion and ketosis have a diuretic effect on the body.

Individuals often feel fatigued for the first few days until ketosis takes over the primary role for energy. Negative energy balance ensues because high protein diets are actually low in total calories, coupled with the ketosis that lowers your appetite. Individuals are limited in the amounts and kinds of foods they are able to consume. Carbohydrates make up the majority of a human being's diet. Crossing that group off the list greatly reduces the amount of calories he or she consumes.

Another problem is that there are no long-term studies done on high protein diets. Short-term studies have shown increases in blood pressure, hardening of the arteries and an increased risk of heart disease. Some individuals have noted a reduction in total cholesterol and triglycerides from these diets. This can be deceiving. The drop was observed because of the initial weight loss in this population. Weight loss in general can improve many things. However, over time the excessive saturated fat and cholesterol from these diets led to very high LDL cholesterol and heart disease risk. This just shows that this type of dieting is a short-term solution, not long-term. It may actually be very damaging.

Interestingly, less than five percent of diets are successful long-term. This means that initially the weight may come off; however, most "dieters" regain all of the lost weight, if not more. This leads to a sense of failure and causes one to feel a lack of self-control. Often times this leads to something known as "yo-yo" dieting, which can greatly alter a diet's success. These diets are difficult to follow long-term. The limited amount of foods makes them very undesirable. Also, excessive protein intake forces the body to metabolize and excrete more waste products. The liver and kidneys may suffer from this abuse in the long run.

High protein diets are not the answer if one is trying to lose weight. The same goes for bodybuilders who are trying to gain weight. These diets don't offer a healthy alternative to a balanced diet. Any kind of diet that restricts a food group should never be implemented. A diet should promote healthy lifestyle changes, not just weight loss. It should include food from a variety of sources. Losing the weight is one thing, but if one is not doing it properly then it can cause damage at the same time. Weight-loss should promote wellbeing, not lead to the hospital. Increasing physical activity is also necessary to maintain a healthy body. Be healthy!

EDITORIAL/OPINION

COLLEGIANEDITORIAL@YAHOO.COM ED/OP EDITOR: MATTHEW DESPRIS

Healing should begin at home

It seems clear that the Catholic Church's administration across the United States has conspired to conceal its priests' abuses. It has consistently refused to report them to state agencies, paid hush money to the abused and allowed abusive priests to continue preaching unscathed.

In just the last week, allegations surfaced implicating New York's Cardinal Egan, alleging that he blatantly ignored abusive priests while serving in Connecticut. This comes after the Boston archdiocese's Cardinal Law protected at least one abusive priest from retribution for years and years.

Calls for Law's resignation have been brushed away by the aging Cardinal, and little has been said about the need to criminally punish him. That said, the clergy's arrogant attempts to escape retribution took a serious hit last week after it was sued under a Racketeering and Conspiracy act in New Jersey. The lawsuit, filed by one of the Church's many abused lay people, alleges that the archdiocese has continually conspired to cover up the abusive behavior of its priests.

The response from the Vatican has been nothing short of embarrassing. Rome has accused homosexuals of perpetrating the acts, suggesting that gays in the priesthood must be excised. American dioceses have half-heartedly apologized for the abuses, thinking that a casual "we're sorry" will somehow repair the damaged psyches of all parishioners, especially the abused. Nobody within the clergy has begun the sort of serious discussion necessary to prevent such abuse in the future, with the Pope himself only going so far as to describe the charges as casting a pall over other priests.

While we certainly know that our criticism will certainly affect little past our University's boundaries, we wonder what the Newman Center has to say for itself, and for its overseeing bishopric. The chapel has said little, thus far only prescribing prayer as a solution for the terrible abuses that occurred between priests and children.

Prayer?

On a campus as liberal as UMass, we wonder if the chapel might not be willing to go further in its address of the situation. While suggesting prayer is helpful on a level of unity, where is the critique of a church leadership drunk on its own power? Where is the analysis of a church that would defend child abusers before it would defend innocent children? Where is the outrage at abuse that must be a part of the dialog?

It seems that the Newman Center is only willing to follow the Church's dictatorial party line of soft apology without condemnation.

That isn't far enough.

It's time for the people of the Catholic faith to stop looking toward its aged and incompetent leaders for guidance on these issues. If the Egans, Laws and the Pope himself take no interest in the repeatedly shocking abuse, then individual parishes must take the lead. No longer can parishioners count on their corrupt leadership to provide the sort of guidance necessary to repair now damaged relationships.

We can only hope that the Newman Center is willing to lead this sort of charge, if not in Massachusetts, then at least on this campus.

As seen on TV

Operators are standing by

BRIAN LOHMES

Due to the fact that I spent spring break here in lovely Amherst, I had plenty of time to watch the tube. There is a whole world of crap to buy off the television. It ranges from diets, to vegetable slicers, to hand tools, and even to currency (even if it is only valid in Liberia…more on that later). I accumulated a pretty good list of the stuff you shouldn't buy off the television.

The Hollywood 48-hour diet: Need to lose 10 pounds in 48 hours? You are an idiot. Seriously, you couldn't have planned ahead to try and lose the weight and now you only have two days left. You would be better off trying to drain all of the gravy out of your hollow leg than living on this "diet" for 48 hours. The that this works is that you get a container of this "all natural fruit drink" that you dilute with water and drink 2-3 glasses of it a day and a bunch of water. You eat nothing. Talk about healthy living!

Ab-I-lectricizers: These things are growing on trees! I remember the good old days, like eight months ago, when the mention of such a device would have people looking at you like a crazy person, because they didn't exist then. Now they are practically selling them on every channel, every hour of the day. You have all seen these, the belt that shocks you into having better abs. Here's a question, don't people who live under power lines get cancer from the exposure to electricity? Hell, cut right to the chase and launch electricity into yourself, don't screw around with that "low level" radiation, shoot the most potent stuff right into your gut.

The Quick Chop: The answer to a question that no one asked, "How can I spend less time chopping small quantities of vegetables, nuts, ice, or bologna. The commercial for this product pretty much takes the cake for b.s. It makes chopping vegetables seem like the most time consuming and dangerous activity ever known to mankind. Read this passage from the Quick Chop website, "The second you tap down, 6 carbon-steel blades, more powerful then Conan's sword, chop your food perfectly. Then, as they retract, like the stinger of a scorpion ready to strike its target, the blades cleverly rotate like the planets rotating around the sun." Insane.

The Flowbee Hair Cutting System: Tired of normal haircuts? Want to look like an insane maniac? Buy a Flowbee. Believe it or not the Flowbee is still for sale, seriously. I remember making fun of this thing back in high school and wondering who the hell would buy one. Apparently, a bunch of people. If you do not remember the Flowbee, it is essentially a shop-vac with a weird looking end attachment on it. You turn it on and touch this end on your head and it sucks your hair up and chops it at a preset length. One of the major selling points of the system is that you can give yourself haircuts. Perfect for the hermit who never wants to leave home! I don't know about the rest of you, but I only allow trained professionals near my head, I have seen too many homespun hairdos gone totally wrong.

G.I.H: Ron Popeil is the undisputed king of selling crap no one needs on TV. My favorite piece of Popeil merchandise is G.I.H. otherwise known as "Spray on hair." We've all seen the infomercial where Ron pulls some sad sack bald guy out of the crowd and whips out a can of G.I.H and spray paints the guy's chrome dome. Magically it looks like he has hair where there was none before! Unfortunately for our own Rob Schulze, you have to have some hair for the stuff to really work.

Collector Coins: Tons of people collect coins. They look for the rare and significant coins that have been minted in the US and around the world throughout history. I wonder if they have ever looked into collecting Liberian coins, because they are always pushing them on TV. What do I mean? Listen closely to the next ad you see for a "collector" coin being sold on television. Almost like clockwork at the end of the ad the words, "minted in Liberia" and "not legal US currency" will be spoken or placed at the bottom of the screen. Will Liberians use a Sept. 11 memorial coin as regular currency? What the hell is happening in Liberia that a company that wants to produce foreign collector coins can rent their mint?

> "…if you cannot cook a pancake using a regular pan and a spatula, drive off a bridge because you are wasting oxygen the rest of us could use."

Perfect Pancake: I am not Julia Child. Hell, I'm not even Julia Gulia, but I can make a damn pancake without a special pan. The "perfect pancake" is a special pan that allows you to cook a pancake on one side and then flip the whole pan, so you do not destroy your pancake trying to complete the complex maneuver that is flipping it with a spatula. How inept have we become as a people that we can no longer make pancakes without a device to make it easier? Here's some advice: if you cannot cook a pancake using a regular pan and a spatula, drive off a bridge because you are wasting oxygen the rest of us could use.

A Spring Break travelogue of New England

BRIAN LOHMES

During my spring vacation I traveled around New England. In my travels I took notice of certain things that may be of interest to the gentle reader. Here is a small sampling of some of my thoughts during spring break.

St. Patrick's Day

I went to Boston for St. Patrick's Day. I think it's the last time I'll do that – disillusioning me. For instance, why do people eat corned beef on St. Patrick's Day? Think about it: Ireland is a Catholic country. During Lent, strict Catholics do not eat meat. St. Patrick's Day always falls in Lent. Do the math. And why did I hear "Irish Eyes Are Smiling," "Danny Boy," and shudder "McNamara's Band" being played all over Boston on St. Patrick's Day this year? None of these are actually Irish songs. Irish-Americans who say they were proud of their heritage were being more proud of the American rather than the Irish half.

I saw the line outside the Purple Shamrock, and saw the bustle inside the bars around Quincy Market. It seemed everyone was intent on simply getting drunk and that uncharacteristically bothered me. I'm not exactly sure why, but I think CBS's Gary Paul Gates may have put his finger on it when he said: "St. Patrick's Day ranks with New Year's Eve as the two days of the year when so many serious and civilized drinkers – [those] who enjoy a good tipple on a regular basis – make a point of staying stone sober. They simply don't want to be associated with the thuggish amateurs who give boozing a bad name."

Down on the corner of Washington and School streets, far from the din of the pubs and the clubs, stands the Irish Famine Memorial. Sculpted by Robert Shure, the two statues depict a family. In one, they are desperate, hungry, cold and miserable, crying out in anguish. In the other, they are hopeful and determined to make a new life in a new world. It's a moving tribute to those who perished in the blights and those who came to America to escape that and find a better way. It was deserted. People passed me, and it, by. The memorial wasn't completely ignored, though. Someone had placed a clump of shamrocks, probably smuggled through customs, in the otherwise empty basket of the wailing and impoverished family.

I blinked the tears out of my eyes and made my way to Park Street station and I passed the Granary Burial Ground, where an Irishman named Patrick Carr is buried along with four other men shot on March 5, 1770 in what came to be known as the Boston Massacre. Of course the cemetery was empty; everyone was out celebrating their Irish-American heritage.

Pat Robertson

Still in Massachusetts on Monday morning, I was flipping through television channels when I saw what looked like a PBS history show – there was a map and a diagram. So I stopped and listened to what was being said.

I have not been this offended in a long time. What I was actually watching was Pat Robertson's take on Islam, which he's been selling since the Sept. 11 attacks.

His central argument was that Islam is a religion of violence, because the Prophet Mohammed was a warrior, and many battles are fought throughout the Koran. However, the conclusion does not follow from the premises. After all, the same could then be said about the Christian Bible, which prominently features people killing and hurting others in God's name. That whole "Thou shall not kill" rule seems to have a list of exceptions on it. If you're an Egyptian then it's ok for you to drown in the Red Sea. It's open season if you're a Philistine. And Mr. Robertson, my catechism may be a bit rusty but I seem to remember Jesus kicking some moneychanger butt in the temple – at least according to Matthew.

It seems fairly hypocritical and wrong to paint Muslims with a broad brush, especially when there are so many unsavory parts of Robertson's own religion.

But then again, I'm a Catholic. Robertson probably isn't interested in what a papist has to say.

> "Arguably one of the worst governors in Massachusetts history, whoever wins the election will have quite the task ahead of them fixing everything [Swift] – and ineffective leaders like Senate President Birmingham and Speak Finneran – have broken."

Maine

Actually, this section is about Jane Swift's announcement that she would not seek reelection and Mitt Romney's that he will. I heard about it when I was on my way to Maine on Tuesday.

I cannot say how pleased I am that Jane Swift will be out of the State House. Arguably one of the worst governors in Massachusetts history, whoever wins the election will have quite the task ahead of them fixing everything she – and ineffective leaders like Senate President Birmingham and Speaker Finneran – have broken. Swift's poor fiscal management has crippled our state's budget. Her attempts to float the budget on a pool of higher education's blood has seriously jeopardized the education of every student in the state, and by extension, the Commonwealth's future.

As for Mr. Romney's announcement, all I have to say is, who is he? He's the son of a governor, ran and lost miserably in the 1994 Senate race. But what does he stand for? What are his issues? I'm not heartened by the fact that he doesn't know what MCAS is and he went to private schools. If this is the best the Republican Party can do I may just have to quit.

ABC's new reality show "The Bachelor": more addictive than crack

By Jenny Oakson
U-Wire Dess

(U-WIRE) CHICAGO, Ill. – So a nice guy with a good job and even better genetics is finally ready to settle down. Instead of going to singles clubs, bothering with psychotics and/or 50-year-old transvestites in online dating or marrying his secretary – he opts to have a major network create a beautiful and diverse pool of women from which he can select a bride.

Now, why wouldn't you watch that? In a word: Darva. But don't worry, this isn't some quirky game show, followed by a Playboy pictorial: "The Bachelor" is more like real life than most of us are willing to admit.

When the producers of "Who Wants to Marry a Millionaire?" decided to try nuptial programming again, they certainly did their trouble-shooting homework. In "The Bachelor," the women have an opportunity to actually date their future groom, but more importantly, they can say "get lost" if sparks fade. Also, this is no Rick "Anger-management" Rockwell – The Bachelor is H-O-T.

Alex (last name withheld so the press can't look up a marriage license and ruin the whole thing – stupid press) is a Harvard grad, a Stanford grad and most recently worked as a big-time consultant. He loves his parents, he travels, he's buff and he's a real guy. During the premiere episode he quivers and fumbles through first introductions and awkward check kisses just like your brother – or at least your brother's hot-ass friend Alex.

Don't be fooled, the show is a game. The first episode, on Monday, March 25, 9 p.m. EST, will set most of it up. It's starts with 25 women, they meet and greet, then at the end of the episode he offers a rose to the 15 women he wants to move into a giant oceanside mansion and date. Over the duration of the show, The Bachelor narrows down the crop – getting to seriously make-out with the remaining chosen ones and potentially making the obligatory meet-the-parents trek. So yes, there is competition, and while the thought of diamond ring-hungry 20-somethings fighting and faking over a 30-year-old makes me want to hate it, I have to ask myself: is this something new?

Everyone has a friend (or 10…) who talks incessantly about her wedding, without a groom in sight. And if the whole successful man dating a younger woman is new, then I guess Tony Randall is a pioneer. This is women being women. Getting the behind-the-scenes sneak peak is not only entertaining, but also educational. If you haven't already, you will (trust me) have to compete with a woman. Athletically, professionally, romantically – this is a chance for normal gals to learn how the big dogs fight. That's worth five episodes of my time…well, that and the fact that Alex could potentially get turned down after he proposes – that sounds like comedy gold.

Elf Power: the new Strokes?

The members of Elf Power prove that they're still obscure enough to have fun in public.

By Mike Luke
The Gamecock (U. South Carolina)

(U-WIRE) COLUMBIA, S.C. – Just like R.E.M. did almost two decades ago, Athens, Ga.-based Elf Power is breaking through in the college music scene. It's taken a while, but Elf Power's sixth album, Creatures, is finally getting mainstream attention.

The band has been touring Europe and is now back in the States.

Elf Power's style lies somewhere between Weezer and Bob Dylan. If that's too broad, you can call them "Power-Wallflowers." Their lyrics are deeply poetic, with spacious melodies and many acoustic-based songs. Elf Power is definitely not the ghastly "I'm depressed, you're depressed, so I might as well make money off of our depression" type of music that is unfortunately popular right now. It's not exactly the type of band you'll bring to listen to on a jog either. Its sound on Creatures is very passive. Put the CD on, sing along and engage yourself in other things. The music doesn't require active listening, but it won't put you to sleep either.

Creatures is a widely diverse album. The vocal melody is the star of most of the songs, and it's also the savior of some of the more lackluster songs. The first song, "Let the Serpent Sleep," is fittingly the best track on the album. It's also the best representation of the band's sound. "Let the Serpent Sleep," along with "Visions of the Sea" and "The Creature Part II" are songs that make Elf Power comparable to the giants of mainstream folk rock music. "Everlasting Scream," "Palace of the Lambs" and "The Haze" represent the more pop-punk style of Elf Power. As with the other songs – it's not the complex song structure that makes them good, it's the melody.

"The Creature," "Things That Should Not Be" and "Three Steps" possibly foreshadow the popularity that may be coming to Elf Power. The songs are very similar to the rock style of The Strokes, who are currently residing high on the Billboard charts. Laura Carter, the keyboardist, plays an accordion on the songs "The Modern Mind," "Unseen Hand" and "Three Seeds," making the band fit into the folk rock niche even better.

For the most part though, guitarist Adrian Finch, drummer Aaron Wegelin, bassist/singer Andrew Rieger and Laura Carter have developed a songwriting technique that yields very similar songs from a variety of styles.

What's the best thing about Creatures? It's not bogged down with love songs! Although some lyrics may be interpreted to be about love, on the surface, most of the songs are not. Part of what adds to the music is that poetry is what the songs actually do represent instead of love. "The Haze" may be the only song on the album clearly about love but, overall, their songs are happier and much more thought-provoking than most popular music.

Elf Power is touring hard and could be huge with the corporate promoting power of a mainstream label.

Streaking lax pummels UHart

UMass improves to 6-1 with romp

By Matthew F. Sacco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's nice to see that the UMass lacrosse team hasn't developed any sympathy for its opponents over the last year and a half.

Because if it had it would have let Hartford off the hook for walking audaciously into Richard F. Garber field and scoring an early second quarter goal to cut its deficit to two. But instead the Minutemen followed Tyler Francey's goal with a 14-2 run to end the game with a 19-5 victory.

Hartford	5

Senior attack Dan Paccione could have edged the Hawks by himself with a career high six-goal performance. Paccione had three of the Minutemen's first four goals including two in the first 1:41 of the game.

He combined with fellow senior Marc Morley for all of UMass' five first quarter goals to jump out to a 5-2 lead. Hartford answered with Francey's goal but Paccione, Chris Fiore, Kevin Leveille and Neil Lundberg combined for five marks in the second frame to give UMass a 10-3 halftime lead, effectively hurying the Hawks.

Seven different Minutemen found the net on the afternoon including hat tricks from Paccione, Morley, Fiore and Leveille and long pole Matt McFarland's second goal of the season.

Fourteen players registered points against the Hawks including left Zywicki and rookie attack Gene Tundo who had three assists each and Chris Doyle (assist) and Tucker Kear (goal) who each registered their first career point.

"It felt good," Paccione said after his career-best performance. "We were just moving the ball out there."

UMass held fast to its reputation as a team that finds the open man. Of the 19 goals scored, 14 of them were assisted. Those stats would be even higher if secondary assists were handed out, but just like the Minutemen spread the wealth, they also share the credit.

"The way our offense works is the one who's creating the play doesn't always get the assist," Paccione said.

Hartford goaltender Rorke Greene was the object of the Minutemen's most efficient offensive effort since a 23-2 pasting of Boston College last year. Greene was solid on first time shots, but throw him a fake and his head started spinning.

"We saw that on film," UMass coach Greg Cannella said after the lopsided win. "He's a big kid and was exploding high so we told our guys to throw him a fake."

Needless to say it worked. Greene made only 8 saves on 26 shots before being pulled with 7:33 to go in the fourth. On more than one occasion Greene was made to look foolish by a well-prepared and highly skilled UMass team.

Twice Zywicki found Fiore on an alley-oop play in which the junior faked high and scored low. Not to mention McFarland's behind the back pass to Craig Conn who fed Morley in front for another tally to make the score 14-4. Then, less than two minutes later, Leveille threw three stick fakes that put Greene on his rear before he casually tossed the rubber over the goal line.

UMass took advantage of Greene's flaws from the games outset. The Minutemen had their best shooting performance of the season as they potted 19 of 40 shots, thanks in large part to superior preparation.

On the defensive end, UMass was just as dominant. Freshman goaltender Bill Schell made 12 saves in just his second career start after replacing Rob Schneider late in last weekend's victory over Brown.

"This was only my second game starting but the guys played really hard for me," Schell said after his first ten-plus save performance of a young career. "They really make it easy out there."

Schell has an advantage that few rookie goaltenders have; he gets to play in front of a very stingy defense. Only twice this year has the UMass backline allowed more than ten goals in a game. But three times they have allowed six or less, including the physical domination of Hartford.

UMass sports one of the most physically talented defenses in the country. The starting trio of McFarland, Tom Fallon and A.J. Cappelli are all 6-foot or bigger and Cappelli is the only one of the three that is under 210 pounds. Together they represent 11 years of college lacrosse experience.

The defensive midfield is just as talented. Senior Paul Hutchen is the leader of a young group, which includes sophomore utility man Chris Geryat, freshman long stick Matt Garcia and rookie short stick Greg Scott.

Both the defensive midfield and UMass' backline contributed to an utter strangling of Hartford's offense.

The Hawks managed only five goals and four were of the unassisted sort, meaning there wasn't anybody open to pass to. UH managed only 25 shots, including 17 on cage. UMass also held its opponent to an 0-7 mark on extra man opportunities.

The Minutemen are now riding a six-game winning streak after losing their first game of the year, a 12-11 overtime setback against Hofstra.

Three spring break wins over Brown (15-14), Albany (16-6) and the most recent thrashing of UHart, push UMass' record to 6-1.

The Maroon and White's second conference game of the year looms in a trip to Penn State on Saturday.

No more Hoopla

Basketball tourney will be terminated

By Eric Soderstrom
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Haigis Hoopla – New England's largest 3-on-3 basketball tournament – will be cancelled next year, according to Lisa Masteralexis, head of the University of Massachusetts Sports Studies department.

Masteralexis said that her department's students will be informed today and a press release will be sent out Thursday.

Professor Carol Barr, who teaches Sport Event Management, the class that organizes Haigis Hoopla each year, would only say that she was unwilling to comment on the program's future.

"I'd rather hold off on that for a little bit," Barr said. "We'd be willing to discuss that in the future."

The cancellation comes despite regular sponsorship from New Balance, Coca-Cola, WMUA 91.1, Lazer 99.3, the Daily Hampshire Gazette and The Collegian. This year, NBA Inside Stuff will be hosting the slam-dunk competition.

Masteralexis mentioned that few know the cancellation was coming.

Asked last night if he knew about the impending termination, Dean of the College of Food and Natural Resources Cleve Willis said, "I didn't know for sure, but I knew that they were talking about it."

Cleve refused to speculate whether or not the state's recent budget cuts led to the tournament's cancellation but said, "It seems like everything around here is about budget issues."

Two students contacted were unaware the cancellation had even been discussed.

Jordan Levine, a student in Barr's class said yesterday he knew nothing of the matter, while Chris Farrar, one of Haigis Hoopla's student media contacts, was rather optimistic when talking about the event's future.

"The future is real interesting," said Farrar, early yesterday afternoon before Masteralexis' confirmation. "It's going to really be pushing this course, pushing this event management class to industry. You'll have to interview to get into the course. Haigis is going strong."

So when told that Masteralexis had affirmed the event's cancellation, Farrar was surprised.

"I really didn't have any idea it was going to happen," Farrar said. "My only thought is that if that's the case, then that's unfortunate.

"But I'm sure the department will find a way to keep value in the management course," he continued. "I have complete confidence Professor Masteralexis will do so."

Farrar also mentioned that a possible reason for cutting Haigis Hoopla could be a fading popularity in 3-on-3 basketball.

"Look at 3-on-3 basketball around the nation," Farrar said. "It is generally on a downward trend. Maybe we'll just have to provide students with a new sporting opportunity."

This year's Haigis Hoopla – the 12th annual – will take place April 27-28 at the Haigis Mall, located in front of the Fine Arts Center. The majority of the games will take place in Lot 32, adjacent to the Robsham Visitors Center. The first Haigis Hoopla was held in 1991 and, as stated on the event's website, "has been a pro-health, family event since its inception."

And despite the tournament's nonexistent future, Barr said this year's competition looks equally as bright at the previous 11.

"We're expecting things to go well, just as big if not bigger," Barr said. "We've started marketing to area leagues, basketball teams, area high schools. We received our first team entry the other day. Getting an entry before April 1 is a good sign, and we're expecting a good turnout.

"Our goal is 400 teams," she continued. "We're shooting for that 380 range. And we estimate about 15,000 spectators. The spectators have been great. Last year we had a climbing wall, we had the Velcro wall, we had the food vendors, and university food sponsors. We have a great family atmosphere; we have a kids' zone area, everyone participates."

Jeff Corwin brings his Experience to the FAC

By Catherine Turner
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Wildlife conservationist, TV nature show host and University of Massachusetts graduate student Jeff Corwin spoke to a packed house at the Fine Arts Center last night to give fans their own Jeff Corwin Experience.

Corwin, who just defended his thesis to the Natural Resources Conservation Department, was invited to speak to the UMass community by the Alumni Association. He was also presented the Eleanor Bateman Scholar award at the end of his presentation. Corwin hosts a weekly show on the Animal Planet cable channel called "The Jeff Corwin Experience."

After being introduced by Elizabeth Dell, the vice chancellor for university advancement as well as a video of clips from his show, Corwin took the stage in a casual fashion and began talking about how he became a nature show host.

"I knew what I wanted to be my whole life, a naturalist – in the footsteps of Thoreau and Audubon, and work hands-on in nature," Corwin said. "[I want to] use television as a tool to share information. Television is a powerful tool of the media, and in many ways it's the most powerful form of communication."

Before he started hosting his show on the Animal Planet network, Corwin had a show on the Disney Channel called "Going Wild with Jeff Corwin." The show was ultimately cancelled but not before Corwin bath butted heads with producers and learned a valuable lesson about television.

He told the crowd that once he got a TV contract he had "a painful epiphany" that "television is all about entertainment and advertising," rather than education. Corwin expressed the newly found freedom he has working with the Animal Planet, and the new challenges he faces with his current show.

"The challenge for me when I make the series is to show people that there's more to natural history than panda bears and koala bears," Corwin said. "Today there is a greater challenge that faces the naturalist. It's a story about resources being exhausted, a story about ecosystems."

Corwin spoke at length about conservationism and his efforts to try and motivate people to become aware of their surroundings and the environment. He also stressed that a part of conservation education is to highlight success stories. Some of the success stories he mentioned included saving cheetahs in Africa and even local ecosystems being restored.

"Even in New England we have more forests now than we've had since the pre-colonial days," Corwin said.

Moving along in his presentation, Corwin shared with the audience his history as a UMass student. He told the story of moving to Amherst and discovering a dead coyote on the side of the road near Palmer, Mass. He had been so struck by the beauty of the animal even in death, that he decided to pick it up and take it to a science department at the University.

"I'm sure someone needs a coyote at this school," he had said. However, apparently the animal never made it to a lab, class or display, but he did not enlighten the crowd with the details of its removal from his refrigerator.

Half way through the talk, Corwin decided to cut his talking portion short and devote more time to answering questions from the crowd. People were asked earlier in the show to write down questions on small index cards that were collected in the middle of his lecture. Corwin drew these questions out of a big bowl provided by FAC staff.

> "Yes, I used to eat bugs. I'm on Ritalin now and that's been corrected"

Many questions were repetitive, such as, "what is your favorite animal?" to which he replied, "snakes." And he did admit that he is 34 years old and that he loves Tasmania. He also shared the story of his worst scar, which came from a startled kangaroo scratching his stomach during his appearance on "The Rosie O'Donnell Show."

When he was asked about the hottest issue on campus of late, the budget cuts, Corwin answered with the same sarcasm and humor that is a staple of his show. "What do you think of the UMass budget cuts," he read out loud, "and what are you doing to help?"

"I think it's getting better," Corwin joked. "When I was at UMass you had to watch out for bricks. The library was fenced in like a murder scene."

Laughter echoed through the crowd of parents and students. "But seriously," he continued, "I think it's tragic. I'm a public education kid. Skills I use every day in the field I acquired from UMass."

Many of the questions he was asked were more lighthearted. A man in the back of the auditorium asked why he doesn't eat bugs on his Animal Planet show like he did while he was on the Disney Channel.

"Yes, I used to eat bugs. I'm on Ritalin now and that's been corrected," Corwin said before he explained that he ate bugs because the producers at the Disney Channel made him eat them because their demographic testing showed that people liked it when he ate bugs.

He answered other questions about his scariest moment (riding a decrepit plane in Indonesia), the most venomous snake (a sea snake), if he has seen a great white shark or a ince kangaroo (yes to both), and if he's ever met the Crocodile Hunter, also a popular character on the Animal Planet.

"No, I've never met the Crocodile Hunter, he lives in Australia," Corwin said. "I don't feel like I'm in competition with him. I think if anything we compliment each other because our shows are so different. The biggest difference between us is that my shorts are longer."

Finally, Corwin wrapped up the lecture by speaking highly about his time at UMass. He complimented the school by saying that the UMass herbatology course is "one of the best you can take in the country," and that he came to UMass because "A. I wanted to stay in Massachusetts, and B. I wanted diverse faculty and students."

"I wanted to be here because there were people working in areas where I wanted to work for grad school," he said. "There is a tremendous sense of community."

Directly after he answered the last question he was presented with the Eleanor Bateman award by UMass provost Charlena Seymour. Corwin is a graduate of Bridgewater State and is now pursuing his PhD at the University of Massachusetts. He is currently the Eleanor Bateman scholar in residence. His show, "The Jeff Corwin Experience," runs on Sunday nights on the Animal Planet Network.

Bilingual education debate today at MHC

By Regan McKendry
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts, like many other states, continues to see an increase in immigrants. The largest groups in the Bay State are Russian, Khmer, Portuguese, and Brazilian. In fact, Framingham, Mass. has the largest single town Brazilian population in the United States. Without these immigrants, the population of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts would have declined each of the past three years.

With increased immigration to the Commonwealth comes a renewed challenge of integrating foreign languages and cultures into America. Spanish, America's unofficial second language, remains at the forefront of the debate over cross-cultural clashes.

While multi-language signage has become mainstream in the majority of public places, the issues of English versus Spanish still causes tempers to flare when it refers to the education of America's youth.

In preliminary data from the 2000 census, the average child per household in Massachusetts has dropped to 0.4. Currently, the Bay State also has the lowest birth rate in the United States. This, combined with an increase in the amount of immigrants moving to the New England area, has forced bilingual education to the forth front of the American discourse.

A ballot initiative is being formulated for the November 2002 elections that would allow Massachusetts voters to decide whether bilingual education should remain in schools or be shown the door. The initiative is similar to ones that have passed in Arizona and California.

To further public awareness of the proposed ballot question, as well as to raise the issue in people's minds, a debate is scheduled for tomorrow at Mount Holyoke College. Taking to the podiums will be Rosalie Pedalino Porter and Catherine Snow, each offering opposing viewpoints. The two have previously debated in writing with contrasting editorials in the March 15, 2002 issue of The Boston Globe.

Porter is a former Spanish bilingual teacher and program director in the Boston suburb of Newton, Mass., as well as an author, researcher, and consultant to school districts. Porter is in favor of changing the current bilingual education system into an English immersion program.

Daily Mississippian (U. Mississippi)

(U-WIRE) OXFORD, Miss. – Anheuser Busch distributing company out of Olive Branch, Miss. has donated $5,000 to the University of Mississippi Counseling Center to help educate students about the dangers of drugs and alcohol.

"We have had a consumer education program since 1985 and we have been working with the University of Mississippi's Counseling Center for almost five years," said Ned Robins, president of A & B Distributing in Olive Branch.

"Just Choose is a two-hour psychoeducational program that informs students on how to help themselves and others when it comes to illness and alcohol. The program through both nurture and motivation activities, helps students make responsible decisions. The program is extremely for Ole Miss students who either are referred to the program by campus housing or Ole Miss who simply want to know more about the issues surrounding excessive drinking.

"We are trying to take a different approach," said Beatrice Rubin, director of Just Choose. "We want students to take a look at what and how they are using and what will they take with them."

The original purpose of Just Choose was for underage drinking but because the majority of Ole Miss students are not of legal drinking age, said Mark Showalter, director of the University Counseling Center.

The counseling center does not believe Ole Miss has moved an underage drinking problem than any other university but is pleased A & B is committed to education, Showalter said.

The University Police Department made 119 DUI arrests between Jan. 1, 2001 and March 21, 2002. Capt. Bobby Black said. Of those, five have been second DUI offenses and two have been a third offense, which is considered a felony. Since Aug. 1 there have been 55 DUI arrests on campus.

"The Alcohol Task Force is a social norming campaign that is committed to misperception correction against alcohol perception," said Jason Dean, assistant dean of students.

The goal of the task force is to help students realize most of their ideas about alcohol are false. On average, the majority of Ole Miss students consume only zero to four drinks on an evening. Most students think their friends drink a lot more than they actually do.

(U-WIRE) ATHENS, Ohio – An Ohio University department laid off two of its nonunion contract employees at the end of winter quarter as part of needed cost-cutting measures.

Communication Network Services, an auxiliary department of OU, notified the employees March 11, said Tom Reid, director of CNS. The eliminated positions include one communications software specialist and one telephone billing worker.

CNS officials originally intended to lay off three employees but were able to narrow the number to two.

"We were able to rescind one by making some internal adjustments, which is great news," Reid said.

Reid said the layoffs are one part of what he called an exhaustive budget analysis. Other cost-cutting measures include reducing system redundancy, eliminating back up systems not absolutely necessary.

CNS is, for the most part, a self-supporting university department. OU spokeswoman Teresa Brown said. CNS earns revenue from off campus phone service, long distance phone service in residence halls and computer repair services, as well as other sources.

But a recent drop in students' use of long distance calling cards has caused budget problems for CNS. Reid said the broad use of cellular phones for long distance calling caused the drop-off.

"The cell phone proliferation has had a really profound impact. That's the vast majority of it. The entire telecommunications industry is having a really difficult time," Reid said. "We're part of the telecommunications industry, and it's finally hitting us."

Reid said some employees under temporary contracts also might be at risk for layoffs. Reid said he does not plan to cut any of the 50 to 60 student positions at CNS. Not including student employees, 66 full-time staff members work at CNS.

Brown said it is unlikely any further employee cutbacks will be made, because employee contracts specify employees had to be notified by March 15 if their contracts would not be renewed. No plans exist to eliminate contract positions elsewhere in the university, Brown said.

"This particular thing isn't related to state revenue; it's related to how their program is set up," she said.

(U-WIRE) ITHACA, N.Y. – Cornell University's "open doors" closed for a senior at the Culver City High School in Culver City, Calif., March 13, as the admissions office for the College of Engineering reported the applicant to Cornell Police for submitting a forged application.

The student, whose name remains undisclosed, a young male, sent an application to the College of Engineering, "and in reviewing his documents, the admissions officers discovered some of the material had been altered," said Linda Grace-Kobas, director of Cornell News Service.

In the complaint recorded by Investigator Scott Hamilton of Cornell Police, the admission officers noted the high school guidance counselor's signature was forged on the application. In addition to this, the submitted transcript also was forged.

"When [admissions officers] called the high school, what [the student] sent in his application form and what was on record at his high school did not match," Grace-Kobas said.

The incident then was reported to the U.S. Attorney's Office for consultation, to decide what measures should be taken against the high school senior.

Although mail fraud is a punishable offense by federal law, Cornell officials did not punish the student, other then denying him admission and notifying the high school and the proper California officials of the incident.

"What the student had done is considered mail fraud, but because there was no monetary loss by the University, the attorney's office decided not to prosecute the case and leave it up to the high school," Grace-Kobas said. "He's a high school student, and we haven't arrested him or anything – we just rejected him."

Last November there was a similar incident that involved a Cornell senior in the College of Engineering, Junaid Ahmed. In that case the student was arrested for fraud and charged with 13 counts of federal indictment by the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"He did the same thing," Grace-Kobas said. "He submitted false records in his admissions application as a high school senior, but because he also received financial aid, he was arrested."

The falsification was discovered in Ahmed's application to graduate school.

The recent mail fraud case involving the student from California was not quite as severe but will remain on the student's record.

Several students commented on the high school senior's falsification of his application.

"He jeopardized his future and for what?" said Janet Lin '04.

"People who have to lie and cheat their way into a school certainly don't belong there," Jaka Skrlj '03 said. "One gets accepted into a school like Cornell due to one's hard work and intelligence. That's how I got here. Anyone trying to do it in an easier way deserves the worst they can give him or her."

Penn State student found dead in her dorm room

By Cindy Koons & Renée Petrina
Daily Collegian (Pennsylvania State U.)

(U-WIRE) UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. – In her Thompson Hall bedroom, Pennsylvania State University freshman Bethany Cynthia Smith was found dead at 2:30 a.m. Sunday, Smith, 18, was pronounced dead less than an hour later, but the cause of death has yet to be determined, Penn State Police Services said.

Called "Booboo" by close friends, Smith was a varsity athlete in high school and a member of the Key Club, longtime friend Jeff Pan said. During her first year at Penn State she wasn't as involved, Pan said, because she had a harder time meeting other first-year students in her West Halls dorm.

"She was a really good person; she just never found her niche," Pan said.

The results of her autopsy will not be released until toxicology reports are completed, which could take weeks, County Coroner Scott Sayers said.

"We're looking to see if there's any type of drugs in her system, be it medicated drugs or illicit drugs," Sayers said. He said there is no evidence of foul play and called her death an "isolated event."

"There's no other parties at this time we believe to be involved," Sayers said. "We're still investigating along with the university police."

Residence Life staff members met with members of Balsam House, Smith's section of Thompson Hall, to notify them of the loss and offer counseling. Xay Chongtua, coordinator for Thompson Hall, said Residence Life is trying to reach out to other friends of Smith as well as her neighbors.

"Bethany was considered a very friendly, outgoing person on the floor, and a lot of people will be missing her," Chongtua said. "A lot of people are trying to process what's happening right now."

Pan and other friends visited Smith's room Sunday and looked through old photo albums.

In her room, he said, there was one album that encompassed her life and was covered with Post-It notes from her mother, reading: "Bethany, you know I love you," and "Bethany, take care of yourself at college."

"That was just heart-wrenching," he said.

Residence Life staff met with the house members twice Sunday and will continue to meet with students throughout the week, Chongtua said. She said the Center for Counseling and Psychological Services will hold special hours if students ask for help in dealing with this particular loss.

Penn State has lost a number of students this year. This semester five deaths at University Park have gained public attention.

Bill Mahon, Penn State spokesman, said about 25 students in the Penn State system die each year, but this year more focus has been on those students lost. This year, he said, more than 20 students have passed away.

"They certainly are getting more attention than they did before, and I think that's certainly appropriate," he said.

Pan said he will remember Smith as an independent young woman. In her senior yearbook she used an anonymous quote to express her outlook on life: "Never be bullied into silence. Never allow yourself to be a victim. Accept no one's definition of your life. Define yourself."

"[An English immersion system] will give English-limited students a greater opportunity to benefit from schooling and achieve their highest ambitions," Porter said in a recent press release.

Snow, of the Henry Lee Shattuck professor at the Harvard Graduate School of Education, Snow is of the view that detrimental harm will be done to the public education system of Massachusetts if bilingual education is eliminated.

"If an anti-bilingual education proposition passes, Massachusetts parents would lose the option of choosing the best program for their children, and their children would lose even more," Snow said.

"The future of bilingual education is a critical issue for public school education across the country," states John Fox, visiting lecturer of complex organizations, who will moderate the event for Mount Holyoke College.

The debate will consist of 15-minute presentations by each speaker, brief rebuttals, and audience questions. It will take place this Wednesday at 11 a.m. at the New York Room of Mary Woolley Hall, and is free and open to the public.

Increase in rapes sets stage for protest at USC

By Sushma Subramanian
Daily Trojan (U. Southern California)

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES – The first date was supposed to be dinner and a walk on the beach. The University of Southern California student parked with her date in a quiet neighborhood, and they stepped outside to witness a beautiful view of the beach.

Afterward, as she held the door handle ready to get back in the vehicle, he shoved her in the backseat. She escaped with a bruised back and torn shirt, asking for a ride home from an unknown family on the street.

"I knew before my date that I didn't really want to go," said the student, who wished to remain anonymous, referring to her mid-September experience. "I didn't completely trust him, but my friends convinced me I'd have a good time. I thought I was being extremely judgmental by deciding who he was before the date. Now, I wish I had trusted my instincts."

Tuesday's "Take Back the Night" protests incidents like these. The event, sponsored by the Women's Student Assembly, is a national candlelit walk protesting sexual violence at Tommy Trojan. WSA holds the event annually during Women's History Month.

The first "Take Back the Night" march in the United States, in San Francisco in 1978, was designed to protest violence against women, especially sexual assault. Some events involve chanting and singing, while others are more solemn.

During the last several years, USC has experienced an upswing in the number of young people experiencing violence, said Elizabeth Davenport, Director of the Center for Women and Men.

Dating violence includes the whole spectrum of sexual, emotional and physical violence in people involved in or pursuing relationships, Davenport said.

The results of a National Center for Injury Prevention and Control study said nearly half of the 500,000 rapes and sexual assaults women report to the police were committed by friends or acquaintances. Eighty to 95 percent of the rapes that occur on college campuses are committed by someone known to the victim.

A rape was reported to the Department of Public Safety late last week, when a female was held hostage in a USC-owned apartment. The female later dropped the charges against the male, with whom she had been in a relationship.

"The number of crime reports shot up," said Astrid Heger, associate professor of clinical pediatrics and an expert in family and sexual violence. "I think you have to look at it from a good news or bad news perspective. Is the occurrence of dating violence increasing, or does it mean that an increasing number of women or neighbors who saw the violence felt it needed to be reported?"

But according to an NCJPC study, many victims of dating violence do not report them. An NCJPC study showed five percent of women reported their experiences of dating violence. The term "hidden rape" has emerged because this survey and many other studies found sexual assault seldom are reported to the police.

The assaulted USC student never officially reported her account of dating violence to authorities.

"Whatever he did didn't ruin my life, so I didn't see it as necessary to ruin his by reporting him," the anonymous student said. "Dating violence was too personal to deal with any police authority."

People probably are reporting these crimes more, said Stacey Sullivan, assistant director of the Center for Women and Men.

"Maybe because of the state of the nation after Sept. 11 and the economic downturn, people have been experiencing fear and then taking it out against each other," she said. "But I think people are feeling braver to come out and talk to someone about it."

The increases in reports may be accounted for by the heightened public education on the prevalence of dating violence and its warning signs, Heger said. Elementary and high schools have begun programs teaching students how to recognize and escape from unhealthy relationships.

"I've seen a lot of dead bodies," Heger said. "The ownership escalates to the point that is so intense that when the woman threatens to leave, the only option is for him to take her life."

The incidents of acquaintance rape reported to the Department of Public Safety have increased from 10 to 12 from 2000 to 2001 and sexual battery from nine to 11, and domestic violence in dating couples has decreased from one to zero.

Warning signs of an abusive relationship may include threats, an obsession with dominance, public humiliation and family history, according to the National Clearinghouse on Family Violence.

Preventative measures organized by the Center for Women and Men include presentations at freshman orientation, residence halls and Greek chapters as well as sessions with resident advisers and peer educators, who raise awareness of dating violence.

Students who have been victimized may speak in complete confidence to counselors at the Center for Women and Men or may be referred to group sessions on or off campus.

"Often that is the first time they have talked about it, so even naming it is huge," Davenport said. "I reflect that I will do anything I can to empower them to make decisions on their own with resources to help them, but they have to decide on their own what they're going to do about it."

St. Brigid's parish: a new scandal?

You know that nation-wide Catholic sex abuse scandal? It just got a whole lot closer to home – try a few blocks away.

There's a magnificent church just down the road off campus called Saint Brigid's. Father Bruce Teague, pastor at Saint Brigid's until Feb. 2001, claims that the Springfield Diocese ousted him for embarrassment after Teague called the local police to report that former priest and convicted child molester Richard Lavigne was spending time around his parish.

If this is really the case, it's horrible. It's beyond horrible. It means that Teague got thrown out for doing the very thing that every expert, lay person, and clergy member has said that the Catholic Church must start doing: blowing the whistle.

But is it really the whole story? Is that really the reason that Teague left the Amherst parish?

It doesn't all add up.

For one, Teague blew the whistle on Lavigne in 1997. When did he get transferred out of Amherst? 2001.

For another, much of Teague's story remains cloudy at the very least. No one has the whole story yet. Even Teague admitted that the reasons he left Saint Brigid's "were much more complex than reported" in an email to The Hampshire Gazette.

So what are those complications? Why didn't Teague come clean on the rest of his story? And if Teague blowing the whistle on Lavigne didn't lead to his being removed from Saint Brigid's, what did? And why would Teague say such a thing if it wasn't true?

For at least another week, you can bet that the details will not be released. Teague has refused to comment until after Easter (next Sunday) out of respect for the Catholic Holy Week, which started last weekend.

Meanwhile Diocese of Springfield Bishop Thomas Dupre has said that "Father Teague is aware of my reasons and they relate solely to the needs of the parish and his performance as pastor. If he is willing to give me permission, I will be happy to set forth these reasons publicly."

All of this begs the question – is there really even a story here? Teague did the right thing in alerting the police to the presence of a sex offender priest hanging around his parish. He remained in the same parish for another three to four years afterwards before Dupre assigned Teague away from Saint Brigid's.

Could one really have to do with the other? Or is Teague upset about something else and is using the current scandal as a way to get even and bring embarrassment to the local Catholic Church?

The answers had better be good.

The way we weren't

Reliving high school hell

SHARON MAHONEY

I don't do high school reunions anymore.

A high-school reunion, for those of you who haven't yet had the pleasure, is a malicious version of "This Is Your Life," only with an audience of hostile peers, waiting to judge you by ten, twenty or thirty-year-old expectations. Like visits home to your parents, a reunion instantly transforms you back into the insecure teenager you spent years trying to leave behind.

Unlike most of my classmates from my then-blue collar hometown, high school was not the high point of my life, so I guess my perceptions are a bit skewed. In fact, my memories of that time and crowd – those I haven't successfully suppressed – make the cast of "Survivor" look like a support group.

I speak from experience. The last Somerville High reunion I attended was my 20th. After two decades, the social dynamic was still the same. The women from the old cheerleader/majorette/pompom-girl clique still clustered at a single table in the center of the hall, just like they did in the school cafeteria, and in snickering stage whispers exchanged observations about the former geeks and nerds like me who actually had the guts or the naiveté to show up.

Meanwhile the popular cyclejocks had too much to drink, and when not trying to paw every woman present, recounted their sports triumphs ad nauseum, like an endlessly looped Springsteen "Glory Days" music video.

It was a memorable experience, but one I wasn't eager to repeat. So it was with some cynicism that I opened the recent invitation to my 30th high school reunion. For $50 a person, I would get to eat rubber chicken or gristle-laden prime rib and get my ego ground to dust all over again, for old time's sake. Such a deal!

If I could be sure that my friends – the drama and music geeks crowd I banded with for self-protection – were going to be there, I might actually have considered attending. But most of our merry band of iconoclasts and misfits didn't show at the last reunion. There included the editor of the school paper (who would later become the first woman Commissioner of Highways for Massachusetts); the front man for the local rock band "Hobbit" (who is now an Assistant Dean at our own beleaguered State University); and a former fellow Girl Scout (who is now Director of the Thomas Watson Institute for International Relations at Brown, where she rubs shoulders with the likes of Sergei Khruschev and Robert McNamara).

I wish they had been there – I would have had some great dinner conversation. Or perhaps not. Whenever I managed to start a meaningful discussion with one of the three people I was genuinely glad to see, suddenly some old nemesis would corner me and bring up an instance of teenage humiliation, ending with "But that's all in the past now, isn't it? So nice to see you again."

Navigating the conversational minefield at reunions is fun, yessiree. Chances for mean-spiritedness abound. There's the "How (successful) are you?" competition, with a point system based on intrusive inquiries masquerading as friendly small talk:

What are you doing these days? (How much money do you make?)

Are you married? (If so, where is your spouse? If not, why? Are you gay or something?)

Where do you live now? (Still living with your parents?)

How many kids do you have? (Have you grown up yet?)

What do you do for fun nowadays? (This is a trick question. Points deducted for answering "Collecting Thomas Kinkade figurines." "Trying to make ball" or "Bingo Night at St. Clements." Points added for "Golf." "Competitive yacht racing" or "Lunching at the Club with the Junior League." Bonus points for "Decorating our second home in Monaco" or "I'm too busy meeting with my trust fund attorney to have fun.")

The packet sent with the reunion invitation also included a survey for a "memory book." I'd like to answer it; I doubt if my answers to the dumber questions would be quite what the organizers intended:

Which teacher are you still trying to forget? Why ask me about someone I'm trying to forget? Isn't that a tad counter-productive?

What was the high school memory you really don't want your children to know about? I don't have kids, and if I did, do you seriously think I would commit the answer to such a question to print where they can find it?

Where was your favorite hideout to sneak a smoke? To drink? Hey, Ms. Survey-Taker, this is Somerville. You forgot the "controlled substances" part of the question. (I can't wait to see how Joe T., now a captain with the Somerville Police, will answer this one.)

Did you meet a spouse during high school? Do you mean nine, or someone else's?

What was your favorite "tech tourney" memory? Gee, I wasn't much for sports. For starters, this was pre-Title IX, so for women, "sports=cheerleading," and you know how well I fit in with THAT group. I did attend the annual pep rally, but not by choice. A handful of us lobbied unsuccessfully to be excused from what we saw as a pointless waste of time (a friend dubbed the event "Little Nuremburg" in the school paper and was threatened with suspension). So we sat in the balcony dressed in black instead of the school colors, silently reading from copies of Orwell's 1984 during the chanting and speeches as the teachers glared at us for our lack of "school spirit." Ah, those were the days.

Here are some questions I'd love to have answered:

To Sally, who dubbed me "Bony Mahoney," a name I only managed to shake by leaving town for good: When is the baby due? What? You're not pregnant? Oops. So sorry.

To Donna, who once whined during a classroom discussion on civil rights, the Vietnam War, and the Women's Movement "Why do we have to talk about such upsetting stuff? Why can't we talk about nice things?" How is the Prozac working out?

To Mike, the All-American straight arrow who avoided a runoff after a dead-heat finish for senior class president by telling his opponent, "You have to let me win – I've already put it on my resume for West Point." Did founding your career on a lie help jump-start your life?

To Claire, who defeated me for senior class secretary on the basis of her membership in the "in" crowd (which supposedly better qualified her to keep the class mailing list and organize the reunions): Why aren't you organizing this reunion?

Oh, well. I guess I'll never find out if classmate Gary Winter (son of Howie) went into the family business with Whitey Bulger and the Winter Hill Gang. I'll never know how the old crowd, who dismissed us as "hippies," feels about Somerville turning into pricier, new-age version of Harvard Square. And I'll not have the chance when confronted with innumerable pictures of kids to whip out pictures of my cats.

But somehow, I'll survive. Happy thirtieth, Somerville High.

Class of '71. Have a nice life.

Busta threatening violence disheartening

ERIC GOODMAN

KRS-ONE once said in a rap song that "ignorance is a poison and knowledge is nourishment."

The words spoken by hip-hop's self-proclaimed "teacher" were meant to send the message to those in the hip-hop community that ignorant ways are easily avoidable if we gain the knowledge of understanding where everyone is coming from. Unfortunately, I witnessed such a display of ignorance by Busta Rhymes on March 10; it is obvious that he never got that message.

The show at Smith College was going really well as Busta and his sidekick Spliff Star were doing an energetic and entertaining set of some of Busta's more popular songs. Then as Busta's time on stage was winding down he asked the crowd for a moment of silence for the notorious B.I.G., who died exactly five years ago the day before. Instead of remained silent, paying their respects to one of rap music's most talented MC's. Everyone that – except one ignorant individual who felt that the moment of silence was because he did like a movie.

Of course, Busta Rhymes responded to the blatant display of disrespect. He asked that the house lights be turned on and began to single out a group of individuals he picked at random. And just my luck, who did Busta single out, but four of my friends and I.

Now I know for a fact that no one in my group or even my section made a noise during the moment of silence but that didn't stop Busta from threatening to "come on up there and beat the shit out of (us)" claiming that he "had insurance and can pay for the medical bills after he is done stompin' the shit out (our) asses." The fact is that it's impossible to actually know who made the noise, so the logical thing would have been to not combat an ignorant act with another one.

I agree that making noise during a moment of silence is a very selfish and disrespectful thing to do, but to respond by making idle threats to my friends and I showed that Busta was just as ignorant as the kid who was acting like a fool.

I used to have a certain amount of respect for those who made it big in the rap game. I respected them because most rap artists came from inner cities surrounded by temptations such as drugs, sex and violence, but went on to achieve a better life for themselves and those around them. A lot of these men tap about losing those close to them to violent acts. If there is one thing I would think most rappers would want to avoid, it's violence. I sure would think that Busta Rhymes should know that violence is a dead end, especially when you are someone that is constantly in the public eye.

I guess I have been misled to believe that rappers who came out of the streets and make millions of dollars would actually learn the proper ways to respond to situations such as this one.

Unfortunately, I have been confused into thinking that money is power. I am beginning to see that knowledge is the true power. Busta Rhymes can continue to make hit record after hit record and rake in all the money that comes with being a rich rap superstar, but in my eyes, he is truly below the poverty line in what really makes a man rich.

Religion must face justice

Catholics need to extract faith

MELODY ZAGAMI

In my high school freshman year English class, I sat between two Protestants. One asked, "So, like where did you used to go to school?"

I replied, "Oh, I went to Catholic school."

Both of their eyes opened wide and suddenly I was assaulted with a barrage of questions about my faith. "Do you believe in abortion?" "Do you believe in pre-marital sex?" "Are you going to be a nun?" and so on.

Though I was never a model Catholic, I thought that for my nine years of grade school I did just fine and followed the rules the best I could. From that first day in high school and on I questioned my faith and all it asked of me. This is a column 17 years in the making. All of the negative things that I thought about my religion, the fears I had about my faith as a business and a power structure that cares more about its bank book and saving face than it cares about its God or its followers is, painfully and sadly the truth.

I am referring, of course, to the charges of pedophilia brought against the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church. I am speaking of a calamity, a virtual breakdown of an institution of religion. It is with a heavy heart that I read every piece of news, watch every clip, and hear every sound bite. It is with a resounding "I told you so" that I remind myself you can't really trust anyone.

The leaders of the Catholic Church knowingly allowed sex offenders to continue to work around children. The Church, whose foremost responsibility is to hear the cries of the helpless, the frightened, and the meek, closed its ears and went about its business to save face from massive lawsuits and a catastrophic public scarring. Now, it is too late, the wounds are too deep to heal and a whole population has to evaluate a relationship with their faith.

I am glad that I attended Catholic school. The teachings of the Catholic Church help those in need and in being a good person, and are a fine start for children. The rules are springboards that guide you in future relationships, both with others and the world around you. After I left the world of First Friday Masses and weekly Confessions and started my journey as a young adult, I realized that the Catholic Church is ailed by a constant resistance to change and that resistance has now manifested as a malignancy. When I speak of a resistance to change, I am talking about the Catholic Church's views on homosexual marriages, divorce, pre-marital sex, abortion, celibacy, homosexuality and everything else that it frowns upon that are accepted in most other areas of modern society.

"The Church, whose foremost responsibility is to hear the cries of the helpless, the frightened, and the meek, closed its ears and went about its business to save face from massive lawsuits and a catastrophic public scarring."

The dynamics of sexuality and sexual need are something that the Catholic Church has never considered without blindness. Is celibacy something that can really be practiced? Absolutely, there are plenty of celibate priests and nuns, but it's obvious that celibacy is not always possible by everyone even when vocation demands it. The time has come for a sweeping reform in the way the Catholic Church views sex. It is time to take into consideration that with time comes change in humans and society and the book must be edited or completely rewritten.

Journalists continually point out that people are still converting, that donations are still being made to the Catholic Church and that people are separating their faith from the heinous acts that have occurred. This is because people need something to believe in. Faith is the only thing that some people have and so they are willing to continue following. I hope they realize that their religion has been deceitful and that they must extract what is good about this faulty organization and leave the rest to be judged by a power none higher than our own system of justice.

PUDDLE OF MUDD
Worcester Palladium
March 23

Puddle of Mudd rocked the Worcester Palladium Saturday night, whipping through all of the hard hitters on their debut album, Come Clean in a tight 70-minute set.

After a 40-minute technical difficulty delay, thanks to a microphone problem, Mudd came out with a fury. Opening with "Out of My Head" and "Nobody Told Me," Mudd rolled through their tunes one after another with little or no break between any of the songs.

Their smash-hit "Blurry" was one of several highlights in the set, which also included strong covers of "Never Change" and "Drift and Die." "Drift and Die" was outstanding, as it combined frontman Wes Scantlin's use of an acoustic guitar with the regular muscle that Puddle of Mudd usually displays in their music. Scantlin did little bantering with the crowd throughout the night, but did encourage a sing-along on the amusing although vulgar "She Hates Me" ("She f---in' hates me! LALALALA!")

Puddle of Mudd succeeds because they don't try to pretend that they're something they're not. They play hard, gritty, loud, aggressive rock and roll – no turn tables, no ridiculous gimmicks, and no cornball shtick. Everything about them is blue collar – and that's what makes the music. Scantlin, guitarist Paul Phillips, and bassist Doug Artito weave their strings together in waves – the riff never let up. Their music is filled with soul, anger, and passion. Scantlin puts every ounce of energy into his lyrics. By the end of the set, you can hear the raspiness to his words; his scratchy voice drained by the strain he places on it.

Preceding Puddle of Mudd was brand new Alabama band Trust Company. Little in the crowd knew anything about their music, but it took all of about two minutes for the quartet to win the crowd over. A mosh pit opened up on their second song of the night, as the Company revved the crowd up with ease. Trust Company has a tough sound to explain, other than to say that it's high-tempo and filled with adrenaline and emotion. There's no real good comparison to their sound, as it's equal parts punk, hard rock, and has some elements of rap. Faith No More on caffeine pills is about as close of a comparison as I can get. Trust Company has no album out as of yet, but a release is in the works for June on Geffen Records.

Opening the night was slow, methodical, synthe sized Thirty Seconds to Mars. Led by former teen soap dope Jared Leto (My So-Called Life), Mars's sound plain and simple, sucks. Like a 45 rpm record being played at 33, Thirty Seconds to Mars's sound drones on and on. Few in the crowd seemed to show any kind of enjoyment whatsoever for their half-goth sound.

Leto's act wore thin – maybe a crowd gets a thrill out of a real rock star throwing drinks on them, but it just seems stupid when no one is enjoying the music either. My little brother described Leto best – "he sounds like a Billy Idol wannabe." At least his bleached half-blonde mullet was good for a few kicks. You'd swear the dude has a skunk sitting clinging to his ears for dear life.

Short skirts, big guns ... my kind of movie.

RESIDENT EVIL
Directed by Paul Anderson
Starring Milla Jovovich and Michelle Rodriguez

Zombies. Zombies. Zombies. What can I say? Zombies. Paul Anderson's Resident Evil plays out like a game of chess...well not chess...checkers...no, not checkers...more like a game of connect four...with pieces of raw meat. Not that anybody going to see this film would expect anything more. Resident Evil is a horror movie based on a video game that was based on a horror movie. Make any sense? I don't think that it is supposed to. The cannibal class metaphor is losing its gusto now-a-days anyhow.

Resident Evil is all about a corrupt corporation named Enron that controls most of the known world. Enron has its accountants create an invalid credit union and then lie to its employees, telling them that their stock in the company was doing exceedingly well. So the employees, thinking that this great stock would add to their retirement money continually pour money into it. Knowing that this was bunk the employees higher up on the ladder cashed out and made a bunch of money. Like clockwork, Enron crashes and its employees are left with no money and no jobs.

Knowing that they have nothing to live for the employees seal themselves in the HIVE, Enron's secret underground lair, and unleash a deadly virus that turns them into man-eating zombies. It's kind of like Shay's Rebellion meets Redneck Zombies...Well maybe not, but its close.

Resident Evil is based on Capcom's successful video game of the same title. Anderson succeeds in creating a video game feel throughout the entire movie. What does the everyday video game movie-goer expect to see? It is an easy question with an easy answer. Video gamers want to see: 1. Zombies. 2. Overdone techno action scenes. 3. Nipple. 4. A leading character with long legs and a short dress that can kick high. Yup, woman's empowerment at its best...directed by a man (Note: Women's Studies students, please understand that I am using sarcasm, a cheap narrative devise designed to get the reader in good spirits).

In this light Resident Evil is a success; the film plays out exactly like a video game. There is even a scene where a green death laser materializes, making the characters dodge, crouch, and jump just like a 2D game of Kung Fu. The 2002 twist is that the green laser eventually spreads out into a web leaving the last character no room to escape. He is sliced and cauterized into two inch pieces, the white of his eyeball runs down his cheek, and then he falls apart like a drunken game of Jenga (see also Cube).

Heavily influenced by (infringing on copyright of) George Romero's Night of the Dawn of the, and Day of the Living Dead, this movie stays true to the model set over two decades ago complete with hundreds of extras in white face pretending to be the not well fed undead and the classic first person handheld camera drowning in a sea of hands. Sadly,

Make money fast – without stripping

ASK ELENA

By Elena Panesis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Hey Elena, do you know any quick and easy ways to make some extra cash that aren't illegal or involve nudity? It seems I'm always broke around this time of the year and it's probably too late to get a job. I barely have enough money for food. Help!

Hungry in Hobart

My first semester of college I carried my life's savings around in my wallet which at the time consisted of about five dollars and a few half dollar coins my grandfather gave me. Since I had no idea about college expenses beyond books and school supplies like ordering out, cover charges at the frats, etc., I did not feel the need to find a job. Yet, when it came to the point that I considered selling my 1982 Oldsmobile since I couldn't afford gas, I knew I had to get off my lazy behind and start making some dough.

There are actually a few ways to make money without actually getting a job, amazing as it may sound. After my mid-semester crisis freshman year, I learned a trade that brought in about ten bucks a week. Okay, I am ashamed to admit this dirty but actually quite profitable job. No, I didn't appear nude on the Internet! (Besides that would be worth more than ten dollars!)

In fact, I very respectably went around the dorms carrying a trash bag in hand and wearing some plastic gloves with a high school friend. We mastered the art of can collecting by knocking on doors and sometimes even entering trash rooms with clothespins over our noses. When we couldn't carry anymore, we'd throw them in the back of my Oldsmobile and head over to Stop and Shop to collect the cash. We'd split the money two ways and then very conveniently grab a couple cans of soup. It's still a little embarrassing but I was young and broke.

Now that I am a little older and am a much wiser senior, I have a couple other cleaner methods to making some much-needed bank. Most of us have a collection of CDs lying around that we barely listen to anymore. In fact, they may even remind us too much of our carefree high school days, when we didn't have bills to pay and could actually afford the occasional trip to Newbury Comics. Do you really listen to that Jethro Tull album that your Dad got you for your sixteenth birthday so that you could relate to his generation? Plus with the wonder of CD burners, you can probably just copy the disc or download most of it off Audio Galaxy or the UMass network.

Grab a bag and go through your collection parting with your less listened to CDs. Then head over to "Mystery Train Records" on North Pleasant Street in town with your choice selections. Let the friendly staff browse through your collection, and make you a deal. Usually they offer about three to four dollars in cash for each disc on the spot. Or you can opt to receive a little more money but in the form of store credit. Either way, your old music will get a little much deserved playing time and you will end up a richer man or woman for it.

Perhaps, you aren't really the CD buying type since you rely on the radio and MP3's. Hopefully, you have a few movies hanging around the apartment since Mystery Train will also take those off your hands for about three or four dollars a pop. A friend of mine recently went in with a gym bag full of old videos and ended up forty dollars richer. I would take that any day over an old copy of Fried Green Tomatoes that I can probably tape off cable or purchase again in the future when I have a real job.

If the used store doesn't take all of your CDs or videos, keep trying! Call or stop by multiple establishments listed in the yellow pages because even store has a different collection. Some may have ten copies of Shrek and definitely do not need another while some may sell ten copies a week and could use that extra money.

One last method that I have tried this semester simply involves searching through your closet and finding those old garments that rarely get any wear from you anymore. Personally, I often get bored with my clothes and either donate them to charity or when I am poorer than usual, I make a little profit. Look up consignment shops in the phone book and it should lead you to a few places in the area that will accept used clothing.

"Lots for Littles" in Amherst asks you to bring over your clothes in a box or bag with your name, number and address on the top. Right now they are accepting spring and summer clothes only, so leave the sweaters at home. Basically, they tag your clothes and put them on the racks until they sell or the season ends. All you have to do is call periodically to check on the garments' status and pick up a percentage of the selling price when the items sell. It's a quick and easy way to pick up a few dollars and clean out your closet at the same time.

Lastly, do not totally give up on getting a job. Some places will hire people for a couple months as crazy as it sounds. So ask around and check online and in the paper. In the meantime, go through those trash rooms and clean out your closet. You may just find a less cluttered and richer you!

While this years Oscars were (in my not so humble opinion) even more boring than usual, despite attempts to spice things up with wacky circus stunts and the perpetually inane Whoopi Goldberg, the fashions were back to sophisticated style. Some stars finally put some flash back into their ensembles with vibrant reds and blues, but black was the predominant color touted by the starlets.

Reese Witherspoon, Julia Roberts and Renee Zellweger all looked stunning in their black dresses. Each represented a different style with Witherspoon opting for a 1920's style cocktail dress, Roberts looking comfortable in a slit-sleeved sheath and Zellweger in an old-Hollywood ball gown. But Kate Winslet stole the red carpet in her scarlet gown with floral garland strap. Gwyneth Paltrow, conversely, looked rather bag-like in a sheer topped gown.

The men, as usual, had it pretty easy. It's tough for a man to mess up a classic tuxedo. (The fashion faux pas just go to show that when men get crazy ideas, things ALWAYS go wrong.) Samuel L. Jackson, Will Smith, Denzel Washington and Hugh Jackman all looked smooth and sophisticated in their tuxedos. Russell Crowe looked like a modern day Oscar Wilde, and I don't mean that in a good way. And did anyone else shudder in horror when those crazy makeup artists gave their speeches. Who wears a fringed tuxedo jacket??? Just writing about it gives me chills.

Apoptygma Berzerk, chillin' with the big guy.

APOPTYGMA BERZERK
Harmonizer
Metropolis

When does "branching out" equate with "selling out?" At what point does an artist's desire to reach a wider audience become alienating to the core fans that helped make that artist popular? For the answers to these questions one needs look no further than the latest release from Norwegian synth-pop act Apoptygma Berzerk. Harmonizer is a well produced, highly glossed over album that is sure to win over new fans while simultaneously repelling those who have followed the band from its days of relative obscurity.

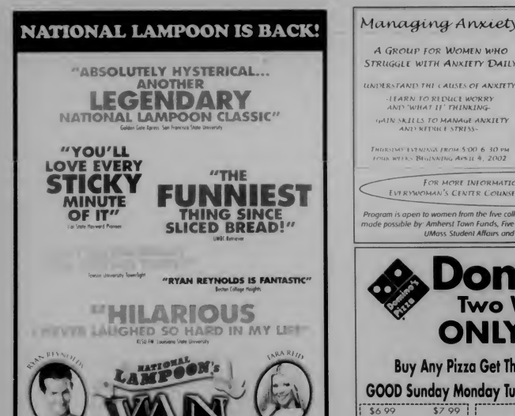
First, let's start with some history. Way back in the day (mid-late 1990s) industrial music was starting to develop a cult following being led to the edge of the mainstream by bands such as Nine Inch Nails. Smaller, more aggressive acts (some who have been around since the mid 80s) benefited from industrial's new found fame, such as KMFDM, Wumpscut and Skinny Puppy. But the general public's fascination with industrial rock seemed to short out as soon as it sparked up; something new was needed. Enter EBM.

EBM (Electronic Body Music), simply put, is the fusion of new wave pop, hard industrial rock and electronica. Since techno music was touted as the next big thing just shortly after industrial, only to suffer the same fate, the chemistry between the two genres seemed to be just right. EBM was being praised as industrial's saving grace – despite the fact that it wasn't anything entirely new – personified by bands such as VNV Nation, Covenant, Iron of Coil and Apoptygma Berzerk.

Apop is the project of Stephan Groth. Groth's dark themes, insanely catchy pop stylings, aggressive beats and growly vocals helped Apop become the forerunner of the EBM movement. Singles like "Bitch" and "Non Stop Violence" found their way onto many a dance floor. With their stateside popularity steadily increasing, Groth signed to Metropolis Records. Metropolis re-released their European-only albums in anticipation of their forthcoming LP. That LP, 2000's Welcome to Earth, traded in the forceful overtures of previous releases for a brand of more accessible, house oriented pop. "Eclipse" is tailor-made for dance halls, and the Depeche Mode influenced "Kathy's Song" is probably their biggest single to date. But despite Welcome to Earth's popularity, the album hit a sour note with fans of earlier albums, such as 7.

So, where does Harmonizer fit into all of this? Let's just say that this current incarnation of Apop sounds more like the Pet Shop Boys than front 242. The album gets off to a strong start. The first song on the album, "Suffer in Silence," makes it very clear that Groth is more interested in expanding his audience than catering to Apop's cult appeal. That having been said, the track is a piece of pop brilliance. "Unicorn" recalls the ethereal atmosphere of the Welcome to Earth album. Harmonizer's first single, "Until the End of the World," is probably the most poppy, non-industrial song Apop has ever released despite the heavy use of guitars (something absent even on Apop's earlier work). The infectious chorus almost makes up for Groth's inane lyrics and its Underworld-style beats make the track destined for heavy rotation in dance clubs.

After "Until the End of the World," Harmonizer seems to fizzle out with very few exceptions ("Rollergirl" "Pikachu"). Tracks such as, "Photoshop Sucks," "Ok, Let Me Out" and the terminally boring "Detroit Tickets" bog the album down, only to recover it with the very last song. "Something I Should Know" (not a Duran Duran cover) brings the album's energy back up to normal levels, but it's a case of too little, too late and the disc as a whole ends up feeling unbalanced. The hidden remix of "Unicorn" might give Harmonizer a bit more merit in the eyes of some that is, if anyone bothered to keep listening.



If you've never heard Apop, check out 7 and Welcome to Earth and then decide whether you like it enough to check out Harmonizer. Harmonizer will probably be pleasantly satisfying to those who were introduced to Apop via Welcome to Earth. For those who favor Apoptygma Berzerk pre 1998, skip this one. It will only upset you.

All of Resident Evil's flaws aside, it is a very "fun" movie. The director knew what he was working with and it looks like he had a blast doing it. Sure, there are some continuity errors, and of course the techno music drowns out the actor's lines – but who cares? Resident Evil is a big budget B-movie. Critics might make some witty little comments on how bad this movie is, but it's not for the likes of Roger on his cornflower blue tie. Resident Evil's target audience is lazy, desensitized college students just like us. only two days rest. For the Minutemen, though, ace pitcher Jesse Santos (2-1, 2.27 ERA) will also be unavailable, as he picked up his first loss of the year at Richmond two days ago.

The rest of the UMass staff has struggled to a 3-9 record and a 5.80 ERA, and has yet to find any kind of consistency. However, the pitching has been exceptional compared to the Maroon and White hitting, as the team has tallied a woeful .237 average on the year.

"We've been talking extra batting practice and working with the coaches," Morgan said. "We have just been a little overanxious at the plate."

Third baseman Aaron Senez has been the only UMass regular that has played up to his potential, and his .341 batting average puts him 71 points ahead of the next best UMass regular, Cullan Maumus (.270).

In the field, the Minutemen have also struggled and have averaged a less than impressive 2.8 errors a contest. The defense was especially pathetic against Wright State and Illinois over the spring break, committing four and six errors respectively in the pair of losses.

"We have made some errors but we just have to work through it," Morgan said. "We need to get some wins."

UMass BRIEFS:

Women's Gymnastics

Junior Katie Teft (Grand Rapids, Mich.) scored a 9.950 to claim first place on uneven parallel bars, as the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team scored a season-best total of 193.950 to place second at the 2002 Verizon Atlantic 10 Conference Championship. The Minutewomen finished behind first place George Washington (196.375), while defeating both Rhode Island (192.525) and Temple (192.275).

With its 2-1 performance in the meet, UMass improves its overall record on the season to 7-13, and gives head coach David Kuzara the 100th victory of his collegiate coaching career. Kuzara's record now stands at 100-68 in his nine seasons of leading the Minutewomen. At the conclusion of the meet, Kuzara was named the 2002 Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year.

In addition to claiming the title on uneven bars, Teft was UMass' top finisher on balance beam, tying her career high with a 9.925 to finish in fourth place. Junior Jen Gendron (Shrewsbury, Mass.) also had a strong meet for the Minutewomen, placing second on floor exercise with a 9.900. Both Teft and Gendron were named to the All Atlantic 10 Conference team following the meet.

UMass' top finishers in the all-around were junior Megan Donoghue (Tewksbury, Mass.), who placed fourth with a 38.550, and senior Tracy Chen (Silver Spring, Md.), who came in sixth with a 37.950. Donoghue also finished fifth on floor exercise with a 9.850, while Chen came in third on vault with a 9.700.

Other Minutewomen to place in the top 10 on an individual event were sophomore Mellory Giberson (Bingham, Maine) on uneven bars (sixth / 9.775) and balance beam (10th / career-high 9.800), freshman Nicole Groccia (Brooklyn, N.Y.) on vault (seventh / 9.650) and freshman Danielle Clark (Kinnelon, N.J.) on balance beam (10th / career-high 9.800).

Women's Water Polo

The 19th-ranked University of Massachusetts women's water polo team defeated Redlands, 12-3, but fell to Cal Baptist, 7-5, and No. 6 Loyola Marymount, 8-2, at the Loyola Marymount Invitational, held March 15 and 16. Senior Megan Perry (Fresno, Calif.) and junior Mattie Newell (Dillsburg, Pa.) each scored four goals in the three-game set.

In the March 15 loss to Cal Baptist, Newell and Perry each scored twice, while freshman Melissa Goldberg (Annapolis, Md.) added the final Massachusetts goal. Junior Kelly Chassy (Morgan Hill, Calif.) dished out two assists. Defensively, Perry had six steals. In the net, freshman goaltender Amelia Degenkolb (Berkeley, Calif.) had four saves and four steals. Senior Megan Thompson (Chesterfield, Mo.) won all four swim-offs on the day.

The next morning, the Minutewomen rebounded to beat Redlands 12-5. Chassy was the only one of 10 different scorers to record multiple goals as she had a hat trick. Perry and freshman Diana Campbell (Baie d'Urfe, Quebec) each had two assists. For the second consecutive game, Perry had six steals. Sophomore Shauna Nielsen (Huntington Beach, Calif.) contributed with three steals, while Degenkolb made four saves and recorded an assist.

In the final game of the tournament, Massachusetts fell to host school Loyola Marymount, 8-2. Newell and Perry recorded the goals for the Maroon and White, while junior Lacy Mackey (Chino, Calif.) had two steals. Degenkolb made six saves in the cage. The Lions were led by Jessica Conner and Lucy Windes, who combined for six of the eight Loyola goals.

The Minutewomen defeated Claremont-Mudd-Scripps 11-6 later on in the California spring break trip, but dropped their second contest to Cal Baptist, 11-6 to wrap up the Golden State voyage.

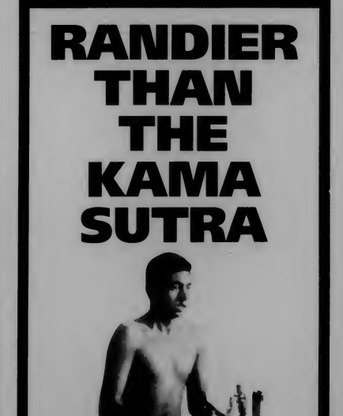
as the Orangewomen scored four straight to up their lead to 13-2. Erica Matewson scored a pair of second half goals and Trombley finished off the hat trick before Syracuse coach Lisa Miller got some playing time for some of her bench players.



Leslie Pollack scored a pair of goals and Nicole Chominski tallied her fourth of the season to round out the afternoon's scoring.

In their only other game over the break, the Minutewomen opened conference play with a 12-6 victory over win over George Washington. Zelinger scored a career-high four goals while freshman Maura McGarrity also tallied a hat trick to lead UMass to victory. Jamie Lee led the Colonials with three goals in their inaugural game as a member of the Atlantic 10.

UMass competition sunburned

Softball successful on Spring Break getaway

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While UMass students stuck in the Northeast over spring break (stuck as yours truly) saw cold winds and snow squalls, the Massachusetts softball team was heating up, winning nine out of 12 games during the 10-day span.

The Minutewomen's first victim was the University of Illinois-Chicago. UMass dispatched the Flames last Friday with some seventh inning heroics, when junior Emily Robustelli hit a sacrifice fly to bring in fellow junior Anna Perez for the winning run. The play was preceded by five consecutive singles including one by senior Ashley Bakken, which brought in sophomore Jamie Cahalan to knot the game at three.

In the second game of the day senior Jennifer Hadley let up five hits and no earned runs, but three errors handicapped the Minutewomen and they dropped the game to Florida International University, 2-1. Cahalan was the lone run for UMass when she tripled to right and scored on an errant throw to third.

The field gaffes continued the next day, as the Maroon and White lost to the University of Missouri-Kansas, 3-2, despite getting eight hits from seven different hitters. The Minutewomen took an early 1-0 lead, but two errors and two walks in the bottom of the second helped to give UMKC a 3-1 lead. Junior Kaila Holtz hit a line drive single to right field to score senior Terri Rooney, but that was the last of the UMass offense. Holtz gave up three hits in six innings of work and no earned runs.

The Minutewomen bounced back in the next game, however, and triumphed over Fordham, 4-1. While the Rams fell off the scoring with one run off of a wild pitch in the second, the Maroon and White answered in the bottom half of the third, scoring three runs on three hits. UMass added one more to the total in the fourth when Cahalan scored on a fielder's choice. That would be all that freshman Kelli Arnold would need, scattering three hits with one walk and no earned runs.

Revenge was on tap for the next contest, as UMass once again faced the Kangaroos of UMKC, this time winning by an impressive 5-1 score. The Minutewomen started the scoring early, with three runs on four hits and an error. Hadley took control of the game from there, and allowed one run on three hits and two walks. Her one earned run, however, would not be a big blemish on an otherwise stellar performance, as it was scored in the seventh inning, after the offense had plated two more to solidify the issue.

The winning ways continued, as did the revenge theme, as UMass defeated Florida International later in the day. Holtz was the story, letting up only three hits and one run in eight innings of work. Eight innings was what it took for the Minutewomen to end it, when Rooney shot a single to right field to score Bakken. The defense held FIU in the bottom of the eighth to grab the Minutewomen's fourth win of the week.

On Tuesday, the Minutewomen entered a doubleheader with UIC and split the pair of games. In the matinee, the Minutewomen used hits from Rooney, Cahalan, Perez, and a host of others to defeat the Flames 6-2. Hadley scattered six hits with one walk, earning only one of the two runs.

However, the Flames turned the tables in the second game. The UMass hits would not be enough, as the Minutewomen lost 8-2. The two UMass runs came in the sixth inning, but it was too little, too late as UIC added four more runs to the four it scored in the first inning. Holtz took the loss, as she and Arnold each earned four runs in three innings of work.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen came to Philadelphia to take on Temple in the Atlantic 10 opener. UMass swept the Lady Owls in three games, putting up some impressive offensive numbers. In the first game, Holtz threw a two-hit shutout, and the Maroon and White's two-run fourth inning was all she would need to earn the win. The Minutewomen tacked on two more runs in the sixth inning to finalize the win, but it was Robustelli's single in the fourth that knocked in the first and winning run.

In the next game, the offense heated up even more, as UMass used nine hits from eight different sluggers to defeat Temple 7-1. Hadley was impressive in letting up one run on four hits, with one walk and eight strikeouts. Her effort, combined with her two other wins on the week, earned her A-10 Pitcher of the Week.

Minutemen skid toward rival

UConn next for Baseball

By Jesse Greenspan
COLLEGIAN STAFF

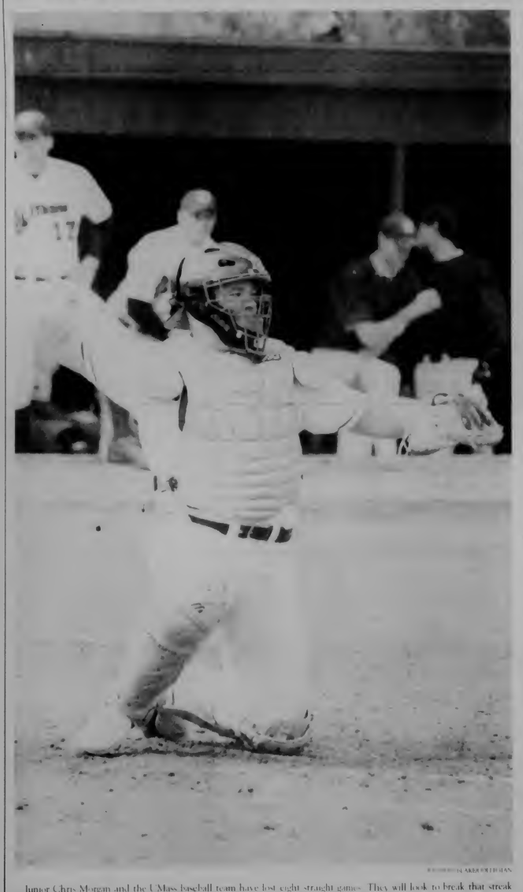
Going into spring break, the Massachusetts baseball team had a 4-2 record and looked like it was quickly getting into midseason form.

When the Minutemen handled Northern Illinois 4-3 (10 innings) in their next contest, it looked like they were primed to continue their early season success.

However, the rest of the spring break was marked by an icy chill, despite the fact UMass played all of its games south of the Mason-Dixon line.

The Maroon and White dropped its next eight contests to fall to 5-10 (0-3 A-10) on the year, with two of those defeats extra-inning heartbreakers at the hands of Illinois and Dartmouth.

"Just about every one we lost was pretty disappointing because we were in just about every game," catcher/DH Chris Morgan said, who leads the team with nine RBIs. "If we hit the ball better and make some plays for our pitchers we will be alright."



Today at 3 p.m. in Storrs, Conn., the Minutemen will try and end their eight-game losing streak against archrival UConn, which has had a year exactly opposite that of UMass.

In contrast to the Maroon and White, the Huskies opened the 2002 campaign with four straight losses, but they recovered by winning eight of their next nine to stand at 8-5 (3-0 Big East) on the season.

Thus far, junior infielder Brett Burnham has been the spark in the UConn lineup, as the Auburn transfer has mustered a .457 average, three home runs, 10 RBIs) and junior Peter Soteropoulous (.360 average, three home runs, 18 RBIs) have also scorched the opposition.

Meanwhile, Jesse Carlson has been the ace on the mound for UConn with a 4-0 record and a 3.06 ERA. Unfortunately for the Huskies, however, no other pitcher has recorded more than a single victory, and Carlson will most likely be unavailable to pitch against UMass.

The junior southpaw threw a complete game in his squad's recent three-game sweep of Notre Dame, and he would be hard pressed to duplicate the feat on

Minutewomen juiced in loss to Orangewomen

By Justin Pearson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In order to be the best, you must beat the best.

On Sunday afternoon the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team looked to continue its impressive opening month of the season and stake its claim as a force to be reckoned with against one of the nation's best, No. 9 Syracuse. The 'Cuse had won all four career meetings with UMass and made it a perfect five-for-five with an impressive 13-5 win over UMass at Garber Field.

The Orangewomen (4-2) used a 3-0 run late in the first half to take an 8-1 lead and blow open what had been a tight contest up to that point. Junior midfielder Jess Trombley scored two of her game-high three goals during this stretch while Kim Wawne and Leigh-Ann Zimmer each added a goal and an assist.

Syracuse came flying out of the gates, tallying three goals in the opening 15 minutes while stifling the UMass (4-2, 1-0 Atlantic 10) attack at the other end of the field. After senior Devon Baer scored her second of the game at the 15:57 mark, UMass head coach Phil Barnes called a timeout to gather his troops and try to get something going offensively for the Minutewomen. The move paid off as sophomore Hope Zelinger scored her team-high 12th goal of the season to cut the lead to 3-1. Zelinger was able to deke past her marker just to the right of the cage and fire a high shot past SU goalie Carla Gigon to give the Minutewomen a lifeline.

However, UMass was unable to capitalize on its newfound momentum and failed to cut the lead to one. The two teams went back and forth for nearly the next seven minutes, creating a number of chances but not capable of converting them, thanks in large to Gigon and her counterpart Cindi Doyle (15 saves) in the UMass cage.

"We took a couple shots and got a couple transition opportunities and we just didn't finish them and Syracuse did," said Barnes. "They capitalized on their possessions after we turned the ball over and that was the difference."

The Orangewomen finally found a breakthrough though with 8:45 to play as preseason All-American Carrie Soults scored her second of the contest to make it 4-1 and ignite the Syracuse attack.

By the time Kelli Kurtz scored for UMass with 1:29 left in the opening half the score was 8-2 and the 'Cuse was firing on all cylinders at both ends of the field.

While it was the 5-0 run that effectively wrote the game off for UMass, the real backbreaker came right at the end of the half. Off a UMass foul with just 1.8 seconds left, Syracuse sophomore Danielle Lillis lined up for a free position shot and fired it past Doyle just as time expired to make the score 9-2 as the two teams went into halftime.

"It was disappointing [to give up a late goal] but it was a good play defensively," Barnes said. "We were playing hard until the end, unfortunately we got the call."

Any chance the Minutewomen had to mount a comeback disappeared in the first 15 minutes of the second half

University declines to negotiate with RA union

United Auto Workers Local 2322 vows to fight UMass administration

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Resident Assistants union was dealt a blow when the University of Massachusetts at Amherst administration stated that it would not negotiate.

The University released a statement saying that it did not agree with the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission's decision to recognize the RAs' bargaining unit under the auspices of the United Auto Workers Local 2322.

"We believe that the decision of the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission that led to its certification of this bargaining unit represents a misapplication of the relevant state statute," Associate Provost Susan Pearson said in a letter to local President James Shaw. "We therefore, consistent with applicable procedures of the Labor Relations Commission, decline to enter into any negotiations on this matter."

The RA union was ratified by election on March 5, and the University did not appeal the result. University spokeswoman Barbara Pitoniak said that this latest announcement was not an appeal, but simply a statement of the University's intentions. Pitoniak declined to comment further. The union claims the announcement is illegal in a statement following the announcement.

"Administrators at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst have said they will break the law and refuse to negotiate with the newly formed union of student Resident Assistants," the union said.

"The University, in a letter to the union, argued that it is acting in a manner 'consistent with applicable procedures' of the MLRC, but that is not true. There are no such procedures, except those to enforce the law. That is like a criminal using a euphemism 'applicable procedures' to characterize a criminal trial for charges to which she or he has confessed."

Shaw expressed his regret at the decision, and promises to fight it.

"We are disappointed that university administrators consider themselves above the law," Shaw said. "We renew our demand that UMass respect the decision of the MLRC and more importantly of the RAs themselves and come to the bargaining table."

Ed Sredzicki, the Executive Secretary of the MLRC declined to comment or speculate on the case since neither side has filed a formal complaint.

"Normally what would take place is that the certified bargaining representatives would more than likely file an unfair labor practice charge, or looking for a bargaining order," Sredzicki said.

"It really varies, each case is different."

RAs are discouraged by the news.

"It's typical. I'm not really surprised by it. I think from our standpoint it doesn't change much. It's a legal matter now. A lot of us are kind of disheartened not that it happened but that the University is undermining the democratic process," Pat Colvario, a RA in Dickinson said. "They're not challenging the vote the challenging our right to vote and that is a little more insidious."

"We had hoped that we could build a relationship of mutual respect by sitting down and bargaining a contract together," Heather Robbins, a RA in Sylvan and a member of the Organizing Committee said in a released statement.

LEGACY

Josh Clayton... Felt like sharing his spirit

By Michael Delano
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Josh Clayton-Felt had a well inside of him that was filled with compassion, understanding and a vision. His vision saw the world for all of its good rather than its bad.

When Clayton-Felt died of testicular cancer in January of 2000 at age 32, he was in the process of spreading his vision the best way he could: through his music.

Released last month on Dreamworks records, Spirit Touches Ground was the culmination of years worth of hurdles for the musician, both personal and professional. The album was completed a month before his death but is just now, through the dedication of friends and family, receiving the kind of push that befits a work of such passion and one with more than a hint of commercial viability.

Josh gave Spirit Touches Ground the wings, and now after two years, it's finally taking flight.

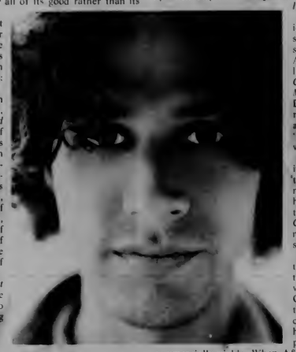
Clayton-Felt's musical journey began in earnest at age 22 when he left Brown University and moved to Los Angeles. With friend and now sometime-Wallflower Michael Ward, he formed School of Fish, whose 1992 single "3-Strange Days" became a modest hit.



Most musicians wait their whole lives for a hit; School of Fish had one on their debut. Unfortunately, commercial success was not something that came as easily when Clayton-Felt began his solo career with 1995's Inarticulate Nature Boy.

The album was a critical success and helped score him an opening spot on tour with Tori Amos, which led to the live release Josh Clayton...Felt Like Making a Live Record. Despite being well received however, the album didn't have the 'hit' that A&M records wanted.

Insistence on a 'hit' in addition to more than the usual assortment of music industry headaches were much of the reason Spirit Touches Ground is being released now, six years after Josh started work on it.

After work began on the album in 1996, then titled Center of Six, a volley began between Clayton-Felt and A&M that called for him to continually tinker with his music in hopes of producing something commercially viable. When A&M was finally satisfied, the release date for the record stayed in limbo until a corporate merger added yet another obstacle.

Faculty to vote on writing program

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Faculty Senate at the University of Massachusetts will vote on four recommendations by the Writing Committee aimed at making students better writers.

The recommendations were delivered to the Senate in the Writing Committee's annual report, which will be accepted at the Senate's 604th regular meeting on Thursday, March 27.

The committee recommends that the University provide funding to reduce the enrollment in English Writing Program 111 and 112 to 15 and 20 students respectively by adding more sections. It is also asking that funds be allocated to improve a computer lab used by the program. Both of these requests, the committee notes, were posed in years past. The program's budget has been reduced due to cuts.

"In a period of drastic budget cuts, the Writing Committee in not sanguine about the possibility of providing more resources immediately, but it is disappointed that the recommendations were not adopted in flusher times," the report reads. "This relatively small reduction in class size would produce a great improvement in quality of instruction while allowing Teaching Associates more time to complete their own programs of study."

Teaching Associates surveyed by the committee resented the cuts.

"Despite hard work that each person puts into the writing program, funds were cut. These cuts caused a lot of harm and all of us have made for it," one teacher said. "This was a serious misstep by UMass, demonstrating its lack of support for an essential program at this University."

Professors should use the steps taught in the Writing Program, also known as College Writing, of multiple drafts and revisions to be used in other classes, the committee said.

"In some programs, students write very few or no papers between College Writing and the Junior-Year Writing Program course," the report stated. "It is not surprising that these students are poor writers.

"A one semester writing requirement is already minimal; at the very least its achievements should be sustained by requiring students to write and revise frequently in other courses."

The third suggestion from the report is that student support programs should "encourage students enrolled in Basic Writing [English Writing Program 111] to allow their counselors to discuss instructional diagnoses and curriculum prescriptions with Basic Writing staff and instructors."

The committee also wants to clarify the grading system the program uses.

Film takes viewers to Vietnam

The 9th Annual Multicultural Film Festival will continue when the film Heaven's Crossroad will be screened tonight, in room 227 of Herter Hall. The filmmaker, Kimi Takesue, will be on hand to discuss her work.

Heaven's Crossroad, which will be shown at 7:00 p.m., chronicles the journey of an unseen traveler to Vietnam, and the encounters that occur between the central character and the country's people and terrain. Comparative Literature Professor Edwin Gentzler describes the film as, "very cross-culturally oriented.

"What she's done is traveled throughout Vietnam, and made a film journal of her impressions," said Gentzler, who will be introducing the film at tonight's screening. "It's about how one explores new places, and how one communicates beyond one's own worldviews."

Heaven's Crossroad is divided into observational vignettes, and has a running time of thirty-five minutes. Director Takesue, in addition to conceiving the film, also served as the film's cinematographer, editor and producer.

She is most famous for her short films Bound and Rosewater, which have been screened at over 100 film festivals and galleries. Takesue was the recipient of the 2000 Eastman Kodak National Scholarship in Cinematography, and has won a number of awards from film festivals, among them the Gold Medal and Grand Jury Prize at the Brno International Film Festival and the Audience Award for Best Experimental Film at the Williamsburg International Film Festival in New York.

Takesue describes Heaven's Crossroad, her latest work, as "a meditation on the emotional experience of travel and the complexities of the cross-cultural gaze."

"She gets the viewer involved," Gentzler said. "The film forces the viewer to be open to new encounters...she doesn't go in with fixed impressions of what Vietnam should be. She's very open to learning new things, and stimulating her senses. There's a lot of beauty, newness and freshness to it."

The semester-long Multicultural Film Festival will continue in coming weeks, with several international films, and one made by a local artist. On April 3, Amherst College Theater and Dance Professor Wendy Woodson's experimental videos will be screened.

The next week, on April 10, the film Trembling Before G-d, a documentary about the lives of gay

The December 1998 merging of A&M and many other labels into Universal left the songs appraised for release sadistically dangling out of their creator's reach. Not only was the album shelved indefinitely by its new owners, but Universal also would not hand over the completed songs to Josh to allow him to try to record them on his own for release.

There was also unrest in Josh's personal life. Unfulfilled in Los Angeles, he found peace with Desiderata of the Earth, a group with a "deep connection and affinity with American Indian ways." A transcript from the website www.joshclayton.com details his deep respect for the attitude and direction of the group as well as his spiritually cleansing experiences in the Sweat Lodge.

Unfailingly optimistic, but uneasy with his music locked away, Clayton-Felt moved back to Boston for a short time in late 1998. With friends and bands in the area, he tried valiantly to keep his music alive with small shows and collaborations.

Feeling a spiritual call, however, Josh moved back west to reconnect with himself and his music.

Ignoring the legal battles, Josh decided to re-record the lost songs himself in his own studio. He completed it in 1999, perfecting what would later become Spirit Touches Ground. In December, he had finished mixing it.

Unfortunately, that personal triumph coincided with Josh's rapidly failing health. The cancer he had began treating during his stay in Boston forced him to be hospitalized at the end of 1999. Josh died on Jan. 19, 2000.

"I like to talk about him, but at the same time it's just..." said Josh's father John Clayton, motioning towards his heart. Clayton, an author, has been a professor in the University of Massachusetts English Department for over thirty years. Speaking from his home in Leverett, it's plain to see the pull between pride and remembrance in his expressions.

Clayton vividly remembers the good times with Josh, from baseball games to backyard jam sessions to relationship heart-to-hearts.

"It wasn't just losing my son; it was losing my best friend as well," he said.

From his music, from his story and from his father's words, Josh feels like a person of limitless energy who touched everyone he met. He left many friends behind.

"Josh was really good at making connections," his father said, and not the superficial kind.

"There was a sense that he loved people, not just their phony surfaces, but their real self," Clayton said. "He read people in terms of what they could be."

In addition to the friends, family and Dreamworks staff that are spreading the word about Spirit Touches Ground, Susan Blond Inc., a prestigious publicity firm whose past clients include Michael Jackson and Prince, have also volunteered to help promote the record.

We'll never know what Josh Clayton-Felt's future could have been, but his music and his life will certainly remain a model of inspiration. Fans have been posting messages on the website since his death until as recently as this past Monday.

"I'm annoying my children by singing the songs all the time," Melissa Molloie wrote on the message board.

"Josh would love to know people are singing his songs," responded Laura Clayton Baker, Josh's sister.

With the push behind Spirit Touches Ground gaining momentum and the hip new show "Smallville" recently featuring his song "Love Sweet Love," there will be a lot of people starting to sing his songs. Josh is sure to hear the chorus get louder and louder.

U. Mississippi cuts grad programs

By Laura Houston
DAILY MISSISSIPPIAN (U. MISSISSIPPI)

(U-WIRE) OXFORD, Miss. - Low enrollment and graduation rates forced 52 University of Mississippi programs into academic probation or removal.

The programs, listed in the Mississippi Institutions of Higher Learning's Academic Productivity Review, have many Ole Miss students and faculty reeling.

The university's master's programs in art history, computational engineering science and systems management and its doctoral English program will be phased out. They will be dismantled because no one is enrolled in these programs, said IHL spokesman Pam Smith.

In this IHL sweep to trim the fat on its state funding, the doctoral pharmacology and toxicology program and the master's program for maternal-newborn nursing, psychiatric-mental health nursing and nursing of children and adolescents have been disbanded at the University Medical Center in Jackson.

"Since the board is responsible for the state funds it is important that it ensures accountability," Smith said.

Some of the 11 Ole Miss and University Medical Center programs affected by the report were those academic units and degrees recommended for three-year probation. Four doctoral degrees were put on probation, including pharmacy administration, mathematics, political science and economics.

"Ole Miss has the only doctoral program in economics in the state of Mississippi," said Bill Shughart, Ole Miss economics area coordinator.

"We would be placed at a decided disadvantage in the future if we were to lose the program."

Shughart added that if the program were found wanting after its probationary period and eliminated, it limits the number of undergraduate courses offered because the classes are taught by graduate students.

Electrical and mechanical engineering are academic units put on probation along with political science's master's degree.

A number of undergraduate students in the programs to be phased out are displeased with the review.

"I guess I can understand if it has a low graduation rate," said Julie Novarese, a freshman art history major from Memphis. "They waste money in other areas, so why are they cutting out a whole degree?"

Art history's master's degree, along with the nine programs to be cut, will be worked out of the university's system as soon as possible.

This review is the first of its kind conducted by the state, but Smith and the institute said this will not be the last.

"It was conducted because the board is strengthening its accountability effort ... it's making sure that resources are used responsibly," Smith said.

Probations and suspensions are no indication of the quality of the program they are placed against, Smith said. The number of students enrolled or graduating is below the standard the IHL deems befitting the programs.

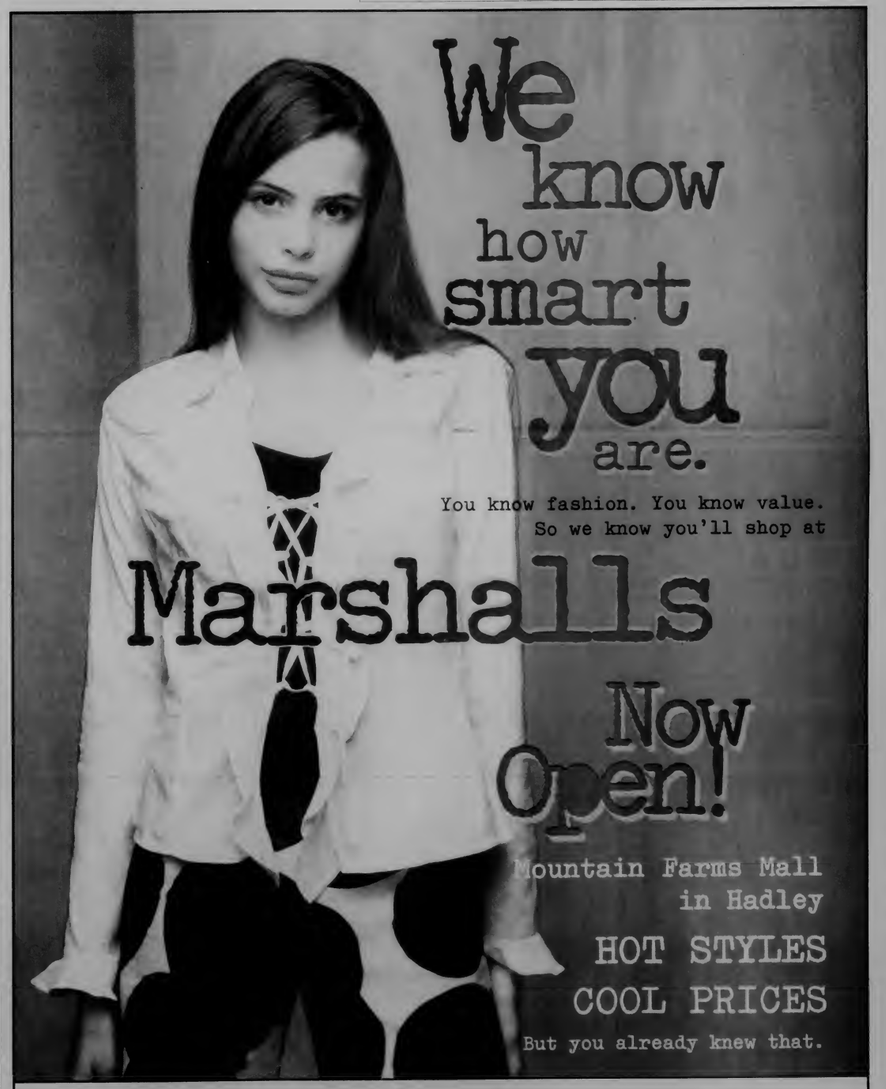
the programs also found that some students with a stronger high school writing background feel the program is "waste of time."

One student said that high school provided "better preparation" in expository writing. Another said that Advanced Placement assignments in high school were "more challenging and helpful" and admitted to using high school papers in the program. A third student stated the class "seemed like recess."



However, many students find the program helpful. One student commented that the class has "become a favorite course." Numerous students commented on the usefulness of peer responses. Other students said that the draft and revision techniques learned in the Writing Program helped in time management in other classes.

Voter turnout looking low

SGA needs to better inform

The Student Government Association [illegible] election season.

Another year of low voter turnout is expected [illegible] percent of the student body chooses the [illegible] the entire year.

After all if you asked the average student [illegible] would have no idea when the election was [illegible] was running for the slots of President and Vice President.

Now obviously the SGA would suggest that it isn't [illegible] The apathy of their peers should not be a reason to [illegible] the campaigning process is dealt with. And although this [illegible] decent argument, it is just a good way to pass off responsibility.

So who is responsible? One could place the blame upon the candidates themselves. Maybe they are apathetic. If this is the case, then we can mark the offices for which they are running to put a couple [illegible] rooms maybe they are not deserving of the position [illegible] for.

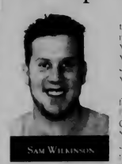
Obviously they know that they were running for those positions and had plenty of time to adequately plan, right?

Well actually no. Where the blame really lies is on the SGA itself. The fact that the senate was unable to appoint a Chancellor of Elections instead wasting weeks worth of valuable time with backbiting and infighting regarding which candidate would suit the political agendas of the most people involved.

Beyond the bickering resembling a senate of old that spent much of its time immersed in disagreement, it was also a colossal waste of time for the candidates.

The individuals, who already only have three days to actively campaign in a time frame (following spring break) that couldn't be more inappropriate, now had to wait until the week before the breaks when the elections chancellor took over his role, before they could legitimately begin their campaigns.

But the poor advertising of the elections themselves could be what is leading to the problems. While there is a televised debate on the campus TV station the SGA does little to inform the students that this event will be taking place. And while polls in both dining halls and the Campus Center are widely available to students on the two voting days, the SGA does little to get the information out about the specific polling stations chosen to inform the students that the vote is indeed going on.



If the school is ever to have a President or a Trustee that is elected by a majority of the students on campus the SGA will have to do more in the way of informing students about candidates and issues before it could occur.

Actions of Church warrant criticism

Keep the heat on until they act appropriately

SAM WILKINSON

By the time you read this, I've probably already met with Deacon Lucien Miller and Father Sean McDonagh. Both were, shall we say, miffed about Monday's Collegian.

More specifically, I'm fairly sure that both didn't like the idea that the Collegian would ask the Newman Center to criticize Catholic administration for its failure to execute molesters.

This marks the second in which I've written on the revelations that have plagued the Catholic Church. In criticizing such a thing, I've discovered [illegible] extremely difficult to avoid offending Catholics when specifically criticizing the Church [illegible].

The Catholics around here are a sensitive bunch. Maybe a few have had the audacity to suggest that I, this newspaper, would never criticize Jews in Massachusetts in the same way that we have criticized the Catholic Church. It's a ridiculous notion at best. The Church has a more specified [illegible] in the United States, except for, perhaps, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. Whatever the case, an administration that would [illegible] molesting employees is worthy of [illegible] criticism. That includes the Catholic Church.

The [illegible] these issues go deeper than that.

It seems that most people desperately want to [illegible] the ties between church administration and [illegible] outside of the church's million complexities. [illegible] Reverends, Fathers, Popes, Cardinals, [illegible] Bishops is damned near impossible to keep everybody separate.

What Catholics seem so anxious to refuse is the fact that the molestations plaguing the Catholic Church taint them as well. No offense meant to the many, many Catholics on this campus, but when the administration of a church covers for serial molesters, and people continue to attend that same church, it is a silent endorsement of that cover-up.

But maybe that's the indictment of a non-Catholic furious at the arrogance of the Church. There are few crimes more damning than molestation, especially crimes committed by individuals that command the faith of their parishioners. There are plenty of theological reasons to criticize the Church, but molestation isn't theological. It is abuse of the worst kind. Therein lies the problem.

Catholics seem to be expecting the media to let up on Church leaders, and by extension, themselves. They've got another thing coming.

While the government around here seems more than willing to kowtow to the demands of the Church at the drop of the hat – there was a loophole in Massachusetts state law which allowed Boston's Cardinal, Bernard Law, to deal with the molestations on his own, rather than reporting them to state officials. The state has been unwilling to charge Law for conspiracy to conceal the abuse. This despite the fact the evidence against him is clear.

The charges have spread like cancer across the United States. New York's Cardinal Egan similarly conspired to ignore abuse while working in Connecticut. Every diocese around the United States has opened cases, some 30 years old, in an attempt to find abusers that had long ago been ignored by members of the Church's administration. Of course, that only digs a deeper hole for the church.

Why weren't these molesters dealt with at the time? Why have their records lingered in dusty files for generations while the Church pretended as if nothing ever happened? Why is it only important enough to deal with now?

Obviously, it is because the Church is getting absolutely hammered in the press. The bone it is willing to throw is the files and allegations against aged priests. But what is being done to prevent these problems in the future?

The Vatican has had the nerve to accuse homosexuals of these crimes (most of the crimes were committed by men against boys, but pedophilia is not an indicator of homosexuality). Instead of addressing the problems maturely, the church has instead sought out the easiest scapegoat in a case like this.

Excising gays from the priesthood will hardly solve the problems though – especially if any priests have ever molested young women. Then again, the Church would hardly have the chutzpah to remove all heterosexuals from the priesthood.

Whatever the case, the point is this – the church is not interested in dealing with this problem. That is why it is being so frequently savaged by a media disgusted at these abuses of power. The Church has seemed unwilling to do anything more than offer the same half-hearted apology that the Collegian mentioned in our Monday edition. Instead of seeing its abusive priests punished (realistically, they should be crucified for crimes against children), the Church only wants the problem to go away. It has betrayed its participants to protect its leaders.

Confusing terms like the Church, which may or may not mean all Catholics in entirety, make it hard to levy such criticisms. We certainly wouldn't want to paint all of the Catholics because the Catholic Church is willing to endorse the child abuse of its priests. But if those same Catholics won't protest their church, then they silently endorse that horrific abuse.

The problem is a challenge to address and harder to solve. Until I see any sort of substantive attempt to really solve the problem though, I fear that Catholics are going down with their Church.

Most concede [illegible] work, and they need [illegible]. Otherwise, national [illegible]. If their words [illegible] their pleas [illegible] passion and seek [illegible] their children [illegible] about 60 U.S. cities have instituted a living wage law. The study, conducted by the left-leaning San Francisco-based Public Policy Institute of California, said such cities owe reduced poverty rates to the law. The article cited an anecdote from a janitor whose salary increased from $6 to $10. Her improved income pretended to illustrate the law's benefit to the urban poor.

At first glance, the numbers praise San Francisco's living wage of $10 an hour, which is about 50 percent higher than the state's $6.75-an-hour floor. Over a 2,000 hour work year, that could mean a $6,500 raise to $20,000. "the difference between official poverty and a lifestyle less desperate," the article said. According to the government, a family of two adults and one child needs $15,020 a year to stay above the poverty line. The study simply asks you to do the math.

David Neumark, an economics professor at Michigan State University and the author of the study, concluded that cities where the living wage is 50 percent higher than the federal or state minimum see poverty drop 1.8 percentage points. He resounds. "living wages actually reduce poverty... if someone's getting up on a soapbox saying these are a disaster, they may believe it, but there's really no evidence."

But Neumark needs to reexamine his own work, and watch his words more carefully. According to his projections, the 10 percent of workers who earn the least in these cities would experience a seven percent increase in unemployment. To Neumark, this silver dagger represents no challenge to the validity of his claim.

He brushes off the catastrophic facts, claiming, "it looks like the winners win more than the losers lose." Management will never sacrifice their profit margin. It is an expensive endeavor to start and maintain a company, given the highly-developed competition present in our country. Therefore, many workers, whose skill sets limit their employment options, are paid low wages. If the government upsets this relationship, then employers are sure to counter by firing enough employees to keep themselves in the black. Their only other option would be to pay themselves less, and no company would do that. Unfortunately, they would fold first.

After reading the article, I could never again support what once seemed a glowing idea. The reality of American economics killed my hope for the living wage campaign, and – unless I see other data that conflicts with Neumark's study – I will now criticize it. The monetary gains of the few do not outweigh the unemployment of many, regardless of the government's poverty lines.

If Neumark really cares for the working poor, then he should be honest about his very important study. Otherwise, he works to contaminate the marketplace of ideas. And left-leaning writers, such as myself, are tempted to fuel his efforts. I stopped myself this time, but I can't catch them all. Every idea vendor needs to reexamine their goals. They need to be humble, even in the face of rejection. Success, after all, is measured in different ways.

DROPKICK MURPHYS
March 15 and 16

Boston's Irish spirit was in full effect Saint Patrick's Day weekend on Landsdowne St. in Boston, where Dropkick Murphys played three solid shows to sold-out Avalon Ballroom crowds. I was able to attend two of the performances, which were being recorded for a live CD and DVD to be released (hopefully) later this year. Between the opening acts, vintage Boston Bruins hockey fights were projected onto the wall behind the stage, to the amusement of a crowd already getting their drink on at 6 p.m. The extremely tight punk rock foursome Avoid One Thing kicked off Friday's show, led by Joe Gittleman from the Mighty Mighty Bosstones. No random BS between songs, just straight hardcore punk for the duration of their opening act. They were followed by Ash, on tour from their native Ireland. Their music – mainly grungy indie rock – was familiar to few, but they managed to warm up the crowd with a fun set before the entrance of the Dropkick Murphys.

As the lights dimmed, and the Dropkicks' flag unfurled, thousands chanted "Let's Go Murphys!" The ten-piece Boston Police Fife and Drum Gaelic Column marched out in full-kilted wardrobe, and played ten minutes of traditional drum and bagpipe music. They marched off as Dropkick Murphys jumped out onstage and into "For Boston," their own tribute to the city. Most of their hits and crowd favorites were played, such as "Good Rats," "Memories Remain," and "Curse of a Fallen Soul." Thick Boston accents abounded. "This one's a real teurjerka," said singer/bassist/songwriter Ken Casey, before launching into "Forever." The obligatory "Spicy McHaggis Jig," an ode to their bagpiper, was played as singer Al Barr invited all of the girls up onstage to dance along. Closing the set was "The Gauntlet," the most recent single from their latest album Sing Loud, Sing Proud.

One of the Boston police pipers came back out for the encore to join Spicy in playing "Amazing Grace." A massive sing-along ensued. The Murphy's then broke into a cover of The Who's "The Kids Are Alright," followed by another cover of The Standelles' "Dirty Water." For this, Mighty Mighty Bosstones singer Dickie Barrett joined in as the crowd hollered along. As always, the final song was "Skinhead on the MBTA," for which at least a hundred people jumped onstage. Somewhat disappointing was the lack of an AC/DC breakdown here like they usually do, but with that many people onstage it looked like they were just trying to finish the song and not fall off.

Overall, Friday's show was good, but with one complaint: The band seemed remarkably sober. Anyone who has seen a Dropkick Murphys show knows that this is quite out of the ordinary, however, I think perhaps they were just trying to play at least one polished take for the CD/DVD. Wait, two complaints: They also didn't play "Boys on the Docks" or "Faraway Coast," two traditionally staple songs of a Dropkicks set. Otherwise, the Boston piper corps was a cool touch, great of them to come, and the rest of the songs were unusually flawless.

But rest assured, they were their usual drunken selves for Saturday's Saint Patrick's Day Eve performance. They could be seen drinking plenty of Guinness right offstage while watching the opening acts The Kings of 'Nuthin' and Piebald. The Kings of 'Nuthin,' from Boston, were a talented seven-piece punk-infused swing band, and gave a very high-energy performance. Probably the coolest part of their set was when the two saxophonists played through a song after lighting the ends of their instruments on fire. The band also left everyone wondering just how expensive an eight-foot stand-up bass really is, after it was smashed to pieces.

Then Piebald came on. I think I might have been the only one there who actually liked them. Halfway through their set (which I thought was pretty good), the crowd started chanting "Emo sucks!" and "Let's go Murphys!" The band played songs that shifted from sweet and melancholy, accompanied by piano, to loud and screaming, with heavy distortion. Mostly, the hardcore Dropkicks fans were having none of it. Pichald dedicated a song to the audience called "You Just Don't Like Me," then left the stage shortly thereafter.

Dropkick Murphys, by now sufficiently inebriated to begin a normal set, again launched into "For Boston," to begin. No piper corps this time, just Spicy. The second show was much more energized than the first; the band was drunker, the crowd a little older, also drunker and more enthusiastic. They again played all their usual hits (this time including "Boys on the Docks"), and also surprisingly broke into the years-old B-side "John Law." A little Irish boy, presumably a relative of a band member, was onstage waving an American flag through several songs, eliciting chants of "USA, USA!" from the audience. Kay Hanley, of Letters to Cleo, came out and sang during the encore, which included a rendition of the Boston Bruins old theme song, complete with a background projection of the hockey fights shown the night before. "I never thought I'd see a pit for that," commented Al Barr.

As always, they ended with "Skinhead on the MBTA," but still no AC/DC breakdown. Another hundred people or so climbed onstage, some screaming into the microphones, some falling off into the audience below. The cameras were still on all night, filming for the DVD, but the Dropkicks were much more at ease than the previous night, and the show was even more fantastic. Dropkick Murphys tend to always put on a good show, but they seemed especially full of holiday spirit Saint Patrick's Day weekend. If you've never seen them live, especially in a small Boston club, I enthusiastically recommend checking them out. It's a great time.

A CD of color felt by the heart

Spirit Touches Ground is a moving testament from the late singer-songwriter Josh Clayton-Felt

JOSH CLAYTON-FELT Spirit Touches Ground
Dreamworks

Twice shelved – once by his record company and next by his tragic death – Spirit Touches Ground, the third album by the late Josh Clayton-Felt haunts as both a document of the considerable talent he possessed and a blueprint of the heights he was aiming to reach with it.

Significant pieces of Spirit Touches Ground emerge from the classic singer-songwriter mold, while others echo more contemporary influences – the late Jeff Buckley's stamp appears widely on the album, though Clayton-Felt spends less time wallowing in life and rather places his greatest energy in finding natural remedies for those troubles with the music itself.

"Building Atlantis" is a roadmap handed to us at the outset, containing a piece of everything that remains ahead. Lyrically and musically, it succinctly maps out in the space of a few minutes what the remainder of the album will move on to explore in depth.

Clayton-Felt steps aggressively into "Diamond in your Heart," dressing it with a unique edge and mirroring the gentle gruff guitar work with the confessional lyrics of the verses. The chorus emerges to change directions, then, rubbing out the edge in compliance with the hope-tinged refrain of "There's a diamond in your heart." As straight ahead a rock tune as you will find on the album, Clayton-Felt also colors the track with a Buckley-like falsetto that works in seamlessly.

The contrast of his vocals only suffers minimally as Clayton-Felt tests the ceiling of his range against the grounded work of his band, "Invisible Trout," with its dirty, blues base, fields a weak chorus, which in this context comes off as too glossy when set alongside the feeling that permeates the rest of the track.

With "Love Sweet Love," however, Clayton-Felt finds his rhythm completely, locking guitar with organ to fuel the first few measures, and then later, at the 1:04 mark, works them independently to build a stairway directly to the chorus, the pinnacle of what is arguably the album's strongest track. Everything on "Love" is in its right place, and if Buckley's ghost put his foot in the door on "Diamond," then he's entirely in the room this time around.

"Deer in the Headlights" gives Clayton-Felt just cause to explore the upper registers of his voice and the deeper meanings of his own words. It's a microcosm of the album, and by association, his world – tales that reflect a sometimes weary life and its occupants, capped by messages of hope and transcendence placed to float on music every bit as gentle as the lyrical message conveyed.

Clayton-Felt is at his best, though when he strips down to the essentials, voice at the forefront, surrounded by spare instrumentation and lyrics that connect directly with simple language and harmonies that weave in and out of the song's folded landscape effortlessly. Lyrically, it's sadly prophetic. "I will always love you so don't get me wrong / But I'm already gone / I'm already gone."

He never stops to rest, however, on those tried and true laurels, venturing into different musical territories with ultimate confidence. "Night of a Thousand Girls" bounces off an elastic bass line, augmented by a punchy guitar and pseudo-Eastern melodies and textures that are exercised to great effect. "Too Cool for this World" is all sweet harmony and inflection, his voice fracturing innocently in all the right places. On "Dragon Fly" the album's coda, the lyrics again speak with refreshing directness. "If you want to get through to the outside / Let the dragonflys come and give you a ride."

It's evident that Clayton, although young, was in touch with something larger, something he used to gain a strength and confidence from. Fortunately for us, he deemed those qualities grand enough to share. The poetic environments on Spirit Touches Ground play like a succession of black and white photographs, drawing power from their simplicity, the songs crafted by the late songwriter generate a color unseen by the eye but felt by the heart. We should all be so fortunate to pen a last testament as moving and melodic as this.

Billy Bragg and the Blokes – How very Brit...

BILLY BRAGG AND THE BLOKES
England, Half English
Elektra

Billy Bragg's work with Wilco on the Mermaid Avenues was amazing. Finding Woody Guthrie was a stroke of genius in a time when overly slick, senseless melodies seemed to dominate American music.

Unfortunately, both the band and the singer have hardly been as good when not together. Wilco, led by Uncle Tupelo's Jeff Tweedy, has never achieved the brilliance of his former band, although his upcoming album gives hope. Bragg, meanwhile, has struggled under the pressure of critics who had legitimately deluded themselves into believing that he, like so many others, could be the next Bob Dylan.

Whatever the case, Bragg's newest album with the Blokes, the horridly titled, England, Half-English, is a real letdown. Or maybe it just seems that way. Two of the worst singles ever can do that to an album.

"NPWA" is a lyrical nightmare, as Bragg attempts to sing a song of unity for the world's anti-Globalization protesters. Unfortunately, anybody listening to Bragg's backneck bleats will find themselves all for a world without commercial borders. He might be a hell of a singer, but his knowledge of worldwide economic policy is woefully erratic.

Lest his attempts at worldwide socialist unity fail, Bragg also makes a call for the end to Britain's Union Jack on "Take Down the Union Jack." It's a little like asking the United States to abandon the Stars and Stripes. Anyway, it's nice that Bragg hates Britain's Conservative Party, and especially Margaret Thatcher, but if he really thinks that "take down the Union Jack/it clashes with the sunset" is a great lyric, he's badly deluding himself.

With all that written, Bragg's English does have a few shining moments, notably the album's title track. A reggae-ish jam paying tribute to all of England's non-English traditions (he eats curry, drinks tea, and the country's lions certainly came from lands beyond Britain's borders), the two-and-a-half minute track is a diamond in the rough. So are "Dreadbelly" and "Tears of My Tracks."

Unfortunately, three songs out of

twelve hardly a good album make. Here's making a call for more Mermaid Avenue albums or a Bragg retirement. Either way, we'll get something worth having: covers of great songs, or silence. (Sam Wilkinson)

JEREMIAH FREED
Jeremiah Freed
Republic/Universal Records

Jeremiah Freed is something of a skyrocket. The York, Maine band is only in their early twenties, less than two years out of high school and have played alongside Nickelback and Saliva in front of thousands of people. Their self-titled major label debut is filled with old school influenced rock 'n' roll perfectly produced for radio airplay.

Not to say that Jeremiah Freed is a corporate creation simply designed to bilk teenagers of dollars. Jeremiah Freed is actually a pretty tight band, and their album is filled with a lot of musically exciting rock that hasn't been heard in a long time. From the funky rock guitar licks on "Wait For Me" to the wordless melody followed by kicking bass and vocals that open "Again," Jeremiah Freed shows influences from the Rolling Stones, Led Zepplin, Lynryd Skynyrd and other classic rock gods, but their vocals and their pace is contemporary.

Other notable tracks on Jeremiah Freed also include "Rain" and "Out Of Trust." The latter has catchy beats and emotional lyrics. The song was written about drummer Joe Smith's father, who passed away after battling cancer. The guitar work on the whole album is impressive, and is exemplified by the killer hook on "Wash Away."

"Reasons" is another guitar-driven song, though isn't as interesting as the rest of the tracks. The major problem with the album is that the first and third tracks ("Stranded" and "Again") sound a lot alike, and may immediately turn off listeners with their long intros just perfectly suited for a voice-over on a radio station.

In short, Jeremiah Freed isn't anything we haven't already heard before, but it's still nice to throw on an album that pays attention to classic rock while still moving the genre forward. (Ken Campbell)

Willie Jenkins to transfer at season's end

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's Basketball

University of Massachusetts men's basketball coach Steve Lappas announced today that sophomore forward Willie Jenkins will transfer to another school at the end of the academic year.

"Willie thought that he would be able to play more in another program, so he's decided to transfer," Lappas said. "We are sorry that things didn't work out for him here, because he's a good person. We're going to help him in any way possible, and we wish him well."

Jenkins appeared in 24 games as a sophomore, drawing nine starts, and averaged 3.0 ppg and 2.2 rpg. He shot 29.5 percent from the field, 22.5 percent from three-point range and 83.3 percent at the foul line. Jenkins' lone double-figure scoring game of the season and his career was a career-best 12-point effort in UMass' 69-62 victory at North Carolina State, Dec. 4.

In two seasons as a Minuteman, Jenkins appeared in 42 games, drawing nine starts, and averaged 2.1 ppg and 1.4 rpg.

Due to NCAA rules which allow an institution to sign five men's basketball players in one year and nine over a two-year period, Lappas said the Minutemen will only be able to have 12 players on scholarship in 2002-03, and will be only able to use one of the two available scholarships.

Women's Gymnastics

University of Massachusetts junior uneven bar specialist Katie Teft was invited to the 2002 National Collegiate Northeast Regional in University Park, Pa., it was announced on Monday by the NCAA. Teft won the uneven bar competition at the Verizon Atlantic 10 Championships last weekend, recording a conference-record tying 9.950.

Six teams, five all-around competitors (who are not on a qualifying team) and one individual event specialist per event were named to each of the six regions. The top two teams and the top two all-around competitors (who are not on an advancing team) from each regional will receive an automatic berth to the national championships in Tuscaloosa, Ala., April 18-20, hosted by the University of Alabama.

In addition, the event winners at the regional championships will advance to the national championships (in that event only) if they are not part of a qualifying team or the all-around qualifiers.

"We're very excited that Katie has been selected to the NCAA Regionals," head coach Dave Kuzara, the 2002 Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year said. "I think she has a really good chance of winning an NCAA Championship on uneven bars."

Teams that will compete at the Northeast Regional hosted by Penn State University include Michigan, Nebraska, Iowa, George Washington, Pittsburgh and host Penn State. Also competing will be individual all-arounders Katie Russo of Rutgers, Cicely Warrington of Temple, Brooke Hamilton of Rhode Island and Yale's Kathryn Fong and Jamie Green.

SALUKIS NOT SICK OF SUCCESS

By Jay Schwab
DAILY EGYPTIAN (SOUTHERN ILLINOIS U.)

(U-WIRE) CARBONDALE, Ill. – Southern Illinois head coach Bruce Weber has probably never been happier to be sick as a dog in his entire life.

After weeks of running on fumes while prepping his team for a postseason run and contending with the increasingly ravenous national media, Weber's body has finally rebelled from too little sleep and too much activity.

Just as assistants Matt Painter and Chris Lowery have fallen ill in the past couple weeks, so too has Weber, who is coughing and wheezing his way through the first few days of the Salukis' offseason.

"For four weeks you don't have a routine or a schedule," Weber said. "You're not eating home food, you're not in your own bed for most of the time, so it just kind of catches up with you. I think when the adrenaline wears off, your body says, 'Hey, you haven't done me justice.'"

Luckily for Weber, he has plenty of newly-created memories to make him feel better.

The Salukis concluded their 28-8 season with a loss to Connecticut in the Sweet 16 round of the NCAA Tournament on Friday. SIU broke its previous best ever win total of 26 and won a share of the Missouri Valley Conference regular season title, in addition to capturing just its second and third NCAA tournament victories ever.

SIU fell to the Huskies 71-59 in a game in which the Salukis were doomed by lousy outside shooting. SIU guard Kent Williams couldn't find any rhythm in the game, an oddity for the usually rock-solid junior.

"With all the media attention and the notoriety, the one person I wasn't worried about was Kent," Weber said. "I don't think it took a toll on him, but maybe it did."

Weber was pleased with his team throughout the season, but even he had a hard time believing how well the Salukis stacked up with the nation's top teams during the NCAA Tournament.

"We were good enough to beat UConn if we shot the ball a little bit better," Weber said. "It would have been a close game, and then you never know what could have happened.

"And then I was in awe of Maryland going into it from watching them against Duke and some of the games on TV, but up close and watching them [Sunday], I thought we could have competed against them... at least this year, we could have competed with the best in the country."

That's something the defense-oriented Salukis proved over and over this year. They proved it by nearly defeating then-No. 2 in the country Illinois in November, and by beating Indiana – now headed for the Final Four – in December.

But it wasn't until SIU knocked off Texas Tech and Georgia in the NCAA Tournament that the Salukis gained much acclaim on a national level, becoming a fixture in the nation's most prominent print and electronic media outlets.

All in all, it was a wildly successful year for the Salukis, who are being compared to the 1967 NIT champion team as the best ever in school history.

SIU reaped its rewards in March, but the Salukis' season was set in motion during an offseason in which the players committed themselves to making major improvement. That work ethic carried over to the season, a year in which the Salukis met every challenge Weber laid before them.

"They never complained or griped," Weber said. "It was a group that if I asked them to read to little kids, or stay and sign autographs, or practice for four hours or whatever, they never griped. I think that has to do with the maturity of the players."

ORANGEMEN EARN REDEMPTION

By Pete Iorizzo
DAILY ORANGE (SYRACUSE U.)

(U-WIRE) SYRACUSE, N.Y. – Four months ago, Syracuse left New York City as Preseason NIT champions. Three weeks ago, the Orangemen departed the Big Apple as Big East failures.

Tuesday night, they return again with a chance to reclaim a season that nearly slipped away somewhere between late November and early March. Syracuse (25-11) faces South Carolina (21-14) at 9:30 in Madison Square Garden for a chance to advance to Thursday's NIT final.

The season has come full circle for Syracuse. What started with so much promise dissipated in a blur of injuries, intrigue and, most evidently, poor shooting. But now Syracuse has found its shot, and with that it hopes to rediscover some of the magic the start of the season seemed to foreshadow.

That begins with senior Preston Shumpert, who finally embraced his role as a leader. More significantly, Shumpert has shaken the eye injury that dogged him through February.

"Preston has been shooting the ball great," head coach Jim Boeheim said. "He's got his confidence back. That's the difference."

Along with Shumpert, SU's freshmen have rediscovered those November moments when it seemed that – despite losing Billy Edelin and later Mark Konezny – the newcomers' youthful energy would complement the veteran presence of Shumpert and Kaeth Duany.

Sure, Craig Forth still struggles to dodge the referee's whistle, and Hakim Warrick doesn't play well enough defensively to start. But without the efforts of Warrick and freshman guard Josh Pace, SU may have wilted its last time out to an energetic Richmond team backed by an even more energetic crowd.

"(Warrick's) just still learning the basic stuff at this stage," Boeheim said. "He's got tremendous talent, and he works hard and he's already gained weight, which is a huge sign."

But, before Syracuse can lay claim to a full return to NIT glory, it must beat a South Carolina team that in some ways mirrors SU.

The Gamecocks won nine of 10 games in a span from Nov. 26 to Dec. 30. After that, inconsistency plagued South Carolina, causing it to fall to the bottom half of the SEC. Now, like Syracuse, the Gamecocks appear poised to salvage a season that did not culminate in an NCAA Tournament berth.

A 74-67 victory at Virginia in the first round of the NIT propelled the Gamecocks into the second round, where they knocked off UNLV, 75-65. Most recently, South Carolina mauled Ball State, 82-47, outscoring BSU 48-12 in the first half in a game first-year head coach Dave Odom deemed "easily the best we've played all year."

Guard Jamel Bradley leads South Carolina with 13.2 points per game, but the Gamecocks win with defense. Although they shoot just 43.2 percent from the field, they allow their opponents only slightly better at 43.6 percent and yield just 61.4 points on average.

"The one constant for our team is that we have gotten progressively better on defense through the season," Odom said. "By the time we got to February and March, we had a good enough defense that we could compete with anyone in the country."

But perhaps more important than anything on the court, Odom – who guided Wake Forest to seven straight NCAA Tournament appearances from 1991 to 1997 – has ratcheted up the expectations in Columbia, S.C.

"We've got great kids who have good attitude," Odom said. "But they did not believe in themselves as players. It was like, 'Who us? We can't win.' They believe they can compete. You try to get them to the next step where they believe."

Tonight, the team hopes to prevent Syracuse from coming full circle and finishing where it started, atop the NIT. If SU pulls it off, it would be the first team to win both the preseason and postseason NIT.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You can surround yourself with people who give you continual affirmation — whether they know it or not. This can be quite a positive day!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may have to wait throughout the day for the information you need, but once you have it, you can pick up the pace and really get things done.

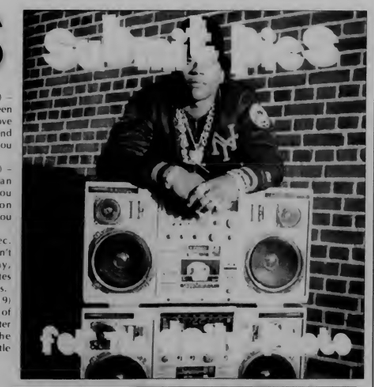
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Your ideas may be challenged today, and it's important for you to hold your ground. Confidence will be on the rise – just in time.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Contact from someone far from home will inspire you to do something that, to others, may seem to be quite out of character.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – If you find that you're talking to yourself today, you'll surely wan to listen because you're trying to tell yourself something important.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Someone may be taking you seriously today while you are doing things purely in fun. Eventually, you're going to have to "face the music."

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Stay on track today despite any attempts the competition may mount to pull you away from your desired course. Concentration is the key at this time.



VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Take care that you don't try to say one thing directly while your body is sending signals that are contradictory in the extreme. Get it together!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – What usually would have been a clear-cut situation may prove rather mysterious to you and others today. It may be that you are "out of sync."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You can prove yourself an excellent listener today. You may have more in common with a Cancer native than you originally thought.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Take care that you don't blow your own horn today, particularly before all the votes are in. Be sure victory is yours.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You can score a number of points today if you simply cater a little more directly to the needs of a loved one. Be a little more generous today.

Lax ready for showdown with Bonnies

The women's lax team prepares to take the field for a 3 p.m. showdown against St. Bonaventure in Amherst.

RICHARD BAKER/COLLEGIAN

By Justin Pearson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team returns to Atlantic 10 action this afternoon when it plays host to St. Bonaventure at Garber Field. The Minutewomen will be looking to erase the memory of their last performance, a 13-5 loss to No. 9 Syracuse, and improve to 2-0 in the conference.

This will be just the third ever meeting between the two sides with UMass (4-2, 1-0 A-10) coming out on top each of the last two years. The Bonnies have not yet won an A-10 contest in their first two years of existence and will need a five-star performance from reigning A-10 Rookie of the Year, sophomore Laura Spaulding.

Spaulding led the Bonnies in scoring last season and is once again leading the way with 12 goals this year. In SBU's last game, a 20-1 win over Canisius for its first win of the season, Spaulding tied a school record by tallying six goals and three assists for nine points.

Despite Spaulding's importance to the Bonnies, UMass head coach Phil Barnes is wary of instructing Bridget Byrne and the rest of the UMass defense to shut the sophomore down and force the rest of the Bonnies to beat it.

"She is someone to obviously look at; she's a good player and has really done a lot for them offensively," Barnes said. "But they have a very strong supporting cast who are equal to Spaulding so we have to focus on them as a team as opposed to individuals."

Just as the St. Bonaventure attack is spearheaded by a sophomore, so is its UMass counterpart, Hope Zelinger, a sophomore from Ellicott City, Md., leads the Minutewomen in goals and points this season with 12 and 13 respectively. Zelinger, along with juniors Iada Finery and Lydia Robinson, will need to find a way to get the UMass attack back in sync after its struggles as of late. Against Syracuse on Sunday the Minutewomen failed to convert on a number of transition opportunities and the Orangewomen made them pay. If UMass is to be successful this afternoon it must convert those opportunities into goals.

"We're definitely looking for our offense to step up and put the ball in the cage," Barnes said. "The important factor in that is to get a good number of shots. We're looking to get back to where we were at the beginning of the year, taking a high number of shots, something we haven't done since the first half of the UNH game."

A loss this afternoon could prove disastrous to the Minutewomen's hopes of qualifying for the conference tournament for the fourth consecutive year. With eight teams now vying for the four slots in the A-10 Tournament to be held in Pittsburgh, any slipup could prove the difference between qualifying for the postseason and having it end prematurely.

"Anytime you play a conference game it's about qualifying for the tournament," Barnes said. "The players understand the expectations around what conference play is all about and what playing well in conference can lead to and what that can do for us in the future."

The Minutewomen's first step on the road to Pittsburgh has already been taken (a 12-6 win over George Washington on March 16) and they will be looking to take the all-important second step this afternoon.

Indiana fans behind Davis and Hoosiers

Cutting down the nets

with Glen Straub

You are playing a competitive game of basketball with some of your best buddies in the neighborhood park. Your team is up 20-19 with the ball on your side and the first team to 21 wins the contest. The ball is checked up and you struggle to find an open man. You choose to pass the ball to the worst, most untalented player on your squad – trusting him that he will not ruin the game for the team. He awkwardly dribbles the ball, trying to get past the defender, but unfortunately cannot get anywhere. Without even looking to see if any of his teammates are open, he bails and chucks up a shot from about 16 feet from the basket. It is one of the most hideous shots ever seen.

In the moment he throws up the shot, you think to yourself, "No! Don't shoot that!" Less than a second later you witness ball enter through the orange rim and the sweet sound of the nothing but nylon is heard. The end result: your team wins the game, 21-19.

You are in joy over the victory, but also left with a feeling of stupidity because you doubted one of your teammates. Anyone who has ever played team basketball knows this feeling quite well.

If your neighborhood park was the entire state of Indiana and you were a fan of Indiana University basketball, that awkward, untalented teammate is current Hoosier head coach, Mike Davis.

In the fall of 2000, IU president Myles Brand relieved college-coaching legend and three-time national champion Bobby Knight from his duties as head coach of the Hoosiers – single handily collapsing one of the fiercest dictatorships of the 20th century.

Many fans of Knight and the Indiana program believed that it was one of the worst decisions in the history of collegiate athletics. To many, Knight is the main reason why the Hoosiers have been one of the most successful programs in NCAA basketball history.

However, his childish remarks and crude behavior proved costly and Knight was forced out of Bloomington. Brand turned over the demanding job to assistant coach Mike Davis – trusting that he would not destroy the steady success of the Indiana basketball program.

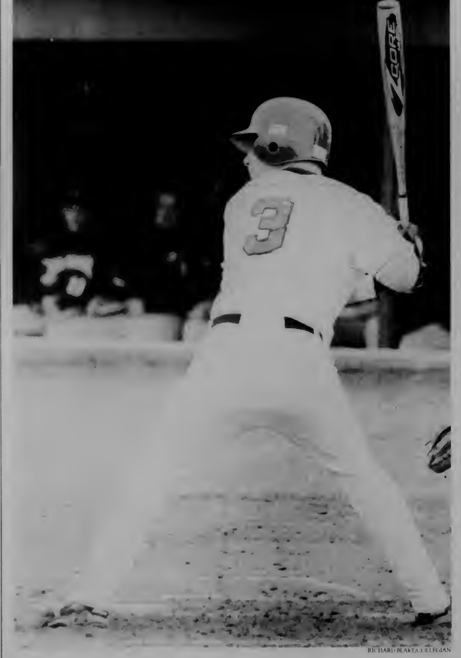
Like the guy on the court who doubted the worst player on the squad, Indiana basketball fans believed that Davis was an inadequate replacement for the General.

In just under two years, the 41-year-old Davis has proved everyone wrong as Indiana will play in its first Final Four in ten years this Saturday night. While the Hoosier faithful is definitely ecstatic over their current success, feelings of foolishness must be lingering in their minds.

The man who was believed to be the only one who could secure the winning tradition of IU, Knight, is going to be sitting at home watching the festivities at the Georgia Dome in Atlanta. His new school, Texas Tech, was ousted in the first round by the 11th-seeded Southern Illinois-Salukis, 76-68. He completed his first season with Texas Tech similar to how he finished many of his last seasons in Indiana. Knight's teams have lost in the first round in five of his last seven trips to the NCAA tournament.

Now we must cut Knight some slack: he has had only one year under the helm of the Red Raiders. Most of the players on the team were not even recruited by Knight.

Many critics believe that Indiana's run through the brackets can still be attributed to Knight because he brought those players into the system. On the other hand, though, the Hoosiers' best player Jared Jeffries is a sophomore. Davis brought "JJ" – as he is known by his teammates – into the program and his 15.4 points per game this season has ignited an impressive 24-11 record and a Final Four berth.



IU is a long shot to win the national championship this weekend, as Kansas, Maryland and Oklahoma have been NCAA basketball juggernauts all season long. The fifth-seeded Hoosiers will have to play perfect games in order to first beat the second-seeded Sooners and then either the top-ranked Jayhawks or Terrapins in the title game.

However, Davis has already proven to the fans, players and administration of Indiana that he can take the Hoosiers to the promise land despite his inexperience.

With an immense amount of doubts haunting him – like the gawky player on your team – Davis settled himself and has left the state of Indiana proud to have him on its team.

Rain out keeps losing streak alive

Leadoff hitter Aaron Senez has totaled a team-leading .341 batting average for the Minutemen.

The Massachusetts baseball team will have to wait another day before it has a chance to avenge its current eight-game losing streak, as yesterday's contest at UConn was postponed due to rain.

However, although that contest will not be made up until April 30, the Minutemen (5-10, 0-3 Atlantic 10) will be back in action today against the University of Hartford at 3 p.m.

The Hawks are coming off a recent split of a doubleheader against UPenn, although their 9-3 win in the nightcap was only their third victory (compared to nine defeats) of the season.

Today's game will mark the first home contest of the year for Hartford, as its first 12 match-ups all came on the road. Senior infielder Miguel Marshal and sophomore outfielder Rick Langer have led the squad thus far, compiling .333 and .303 averages, respectively.

Meanwhile, freshman first baseman Ryan Cuscovitch and junior catcher Keith Mirante have supplied the power in the lineup, totaling two homers and seven RBIs apiece.

On the mound, Scott Rox (2-95 ERA) has been the ace of the staff despite totaling a paltry 1-3 record. Against the Quakers in the first game of the twinbill, he suffered a tough-luck complete game defeat (3-2), and will most likely be unavailable to pitch against UMass.

That is especially good news for the Minutemen, as the rest of the Hartford staff has been absolutely atrocious, posting an 8.90 ERA.

However, the Maroon and White bats have fared no better, and virtually every regular in the UMass lineup is mired in a slump.

Before the 2002 season, outfielder Mike Kulak and first baseman Jeff Altieri had posted .350 and .330 career averages, respectively. Now, both are struggling immensely, as Altieri's .224 batting average is sadly only 25 points behind that of Kulak's.

However, Altieri and Kulak are far from the only Minutemen slumping. Outfielders Jason Twomley (.087) and Tim Klett (.194) have both failed to yield any offensive production and have a mere two extra-base hits between them, while catcher Tom Ellerbrook and his .118 average have been just as inept at the plate.

Even sophomore middle infielders Adam Stojanowski and Cullan Maumus have failed to duplicate their fiery freshman campaigns, and are batting .269 and .270, respectively.

In fact, third baseman Aaron Senez has been the only regular consistently producing with the bat, as he has posted a team-leading .341 average.

After the Hartford contest, UMass next competes this upcoming weekend in a three-game series against George Washington. The first game of Friday's doubleheader kicks off at noon at Earl Lorden Field in Amherst.

Amherst elections yield few surprises

Student voting for the Amherst town elections took place in the Hamden Dining Commons in Southwest for all residents registered to vote.

Incumbents taste victory

The Town of Amherst re-elected Charles Seppala and Eva Schiffer last night in a race for the two open select board positions and gave committee slots to a number of others.

Vying for the two open select board spots were Mathieu Jordan Massengill, Pruddy Gomez in his third attempt at a select board spot, David John Thistle and Seppala and Schiffer.

Top issues that the candidates have had to address are the financial situation of the town of Amherst and the possibility of replacing the town meeting form of government with a general council.

Schiffer is now to start her third term as a select board member. The 77-year-old is a retired professor emeritus for the University of Massachusetts in the German Department; she received her undergraduate degree from the University in 1955. She has dealt heavily with economic issues within the town as well, working as a member of the Finance Committee from 1990-1996.

Politics in the town of Amherst have held the attention of Seppala since 1999. The Navy Veteran moved to Amherst in 1990 and operates the Pelham Auto Service. The 34-year-old lives in town with his wife and two children. He is also a town meeting member and sits on the Garage Building Committee.

While there were no ballot questions for town voters to address this year, other positions that were voted upon included a slot on the Redevelopment Authority. The spot went to incumbent Nathan Salwen besting opponent Pennington Pitts.

In other positions, Maureen Catherine O'Leary and Anita Page were elected to the positions of Jones Library Trustees. The candidates ran unopposed for the seats.

Elected to the School Committee this year were Alisa Brewer, Issaac Benezra, Joan Ross Logan, Harrison Gregg and David Farnham.

Voter turnout this year was lower than it has been in previous years. In 2000, the town saw a boost in student voters with the addition of a question addressing the decriminalization of marijuana. The percentage hit 20 percent of available voters. This year the margin was that approximately 7.7 percent of registered voters made it to the polls.

Student Government Association elections for the positions of Student Trustee and President are also in the process of taking place. Voting is going on today and was also held yesterday.

Candidates for the position of President are Bill Boyce, Steven Hueschele, Dave Carr, Ed Karamerer, Robert Chirwa and Chris White. Running for the position of Trustee include Sean O'Doherty, Rob Moore, Bill Powers and Ewan H. Munro Jr. There will also be elections for Area Governor for each of the living areas on campus.

Voting will be taking place all day in the Dining Commons on campus.

Mickey Mouse Monopoly

By Bridget Henry
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Radical Student Union (RSU) presented the film Mickey Mouse Monopoly at the University of Massachusetts on Tuesday night in the Campus Center. The film explored the effects of Disney's multi-million dollar corporation on American society, thought and culture.

The film begins with college students discussing whether or not Disney movies promote negative stereotypes. One young woman stated, "Disney doesn't harm kids. Even if Disney promotes negative stereotypes it takes an adult to realize the underlying meanings."

Dr. Henry Giroux, author of The Mouse that Roared: Disney and the End of Innocence, thinks that Disney is harmful to youth, and to the rest of America as well.

"Disney makes a spectacle of innocence, allowing it to separate from corporate image" said Dr. Giroux. He also believes that Disney has control over the news released to the public because of the media outlets it owns.

"Disney owns media production, radio, movie theaters, theme parks, Internet sites and ABC News. It is a media conglomeration, controlling the images they want us to see and skewing the American public's world view."

The film then explored the belief systems of race, class and gender, projected to kids by Disney movies, as well as the promotion of stereotypes.

"Disney is an important part of American culture, because kids grow up with it." Dr. Alvin Poussaint, director of the media center of the Judge Baker Children's Center in Boston said.

Gail Dines, professor of sociology at Wheelock College argues that Disney has taken up the role of what she calls "dominant storyteller."

"Are these stories we want kids to hear? We allow Disney to shape kid's imaginations," Dines said.

A slew of Disney's female characters were shown one after the other as Dr. Carolyn Newberger, professor of psychology at Harvard Medical School, commented on the way women are portrayed in Disney movies. From the giggly blondes in Beauty and the Beast to the tiny-waisted Megara in Hercules to the tiny but curvy Tinkerbelle in Peter Pan, Dr. Newberger believes that Disney's female characters are "highly sexualized," and that they are "caricatures of what real women are like." She also believes that Disney movies "destruct notions of femininity" by sending messages to young girls about "how to be a woman."

"When you see all those negative images of women put together, it really makes an argument," stated Artie Seelig, a senior neuroscience major and member of the RSU in a discussion he led after the viewing.

Dr. Elizabeth Hadley, assistant research professor at Georgetown University continued to address the messages Disney sends to young girls.

"In Aladdin, Jasmine becomes a seductress to trick the evil Jafar. In The Little Mermaid Ariel trades her voice to the sea witch for a pair of legs, left with only her body to win the heart of Prince Eric. This gives girls the idea that they can use their bodies to manipulate men to get what they want."

"In Beauty and the Beast, the Beast is horribly abusive to Belle, and she changes him," Dr. Newberger continued. "This gives young girls the idea that when they are in an abusive relationship, they should overlook the abuse to find the prince inside." Statements from two girls, ages 7 and 9 supported her thoughts.

"If I had a friend like Belle I would tell her to just be nice to him. Belle is nice to the Beast and in the end of the movie, he becomes nice," said a 9-year-old.

The rest of the film explored the racial stereotypes that it claims are perpetuated by Disney films. The film argued that Disney movies harm minorities by portraying them as stupid, conniving or less than human. The way Native Americans were depicted in Peter Pan and Pocahontas was considered stereotypical. Many commentators were horrified that history was rewritten to give the idea that the Native Americans and settlers lived in peace.

Another issue addressed was the absence of black human characters in all Disney movies. Dr. Poussant pointed out that black voices were given to

Elections issues take center stage for SGA

With no motions on the agenda, this year's Presidential and Trustee elections took front and center at last night's Student Government Association meeting.

The elections, which end tonight at 7 p.m. were among the few announcements made by members of the SGA. Members discussed the need for continuing clean elections as well as explained that they are hopefully that they will receive the needed five percent student vote.

"For this years spring elections and to everyone that's running, please keep them clean," Speaker Aaron Saunders said.

President John Sheehan and Student Trustee Jon Laubinger said good-bye to the Senate last night as they gave their final Executive Cabinet reports of their term. Sheehan expressed his thanks to the Senate as well as stated that he will continue to work for the SGA after his term expires.

"I've had an excellent time this year, and we've been able to do a lot of cool things this year," Sheehan said. "I've learned a lot about myself and I thank you for taking part this year."

Laubinger expressed the need for student involvement when it comes to the final decisions surrounding the new chancellor search.

Discussion surrounding the administration's decision to turn down the Fair Share Act arose discussion amongst members of the SGA. The motion, which called for the administration to take a five percent pay cut this coming year in an effort to curve budget cuts was denied by Interim Chancellor Marci Williams.

"We had a blow struck against us with the Fair Share Act, and right now our focus needs to be on getting the administration to take their fair share in the cuts that are happening," Sheehan said. "I plan to focus all my attention on this issue even after my terms expires."

Saunders also commented on the administrations decision, by explaining that he felt that the administration lacked responsibility when it came to the motion.

"This whole year we've been able to work with the administration and I don't know how many times that I've called Chancellor Williams and never received a phone call or email back," Saunders said. "This should not be acceptable and to get a letter on the last day possible under the Wellman document saying thanks but no

ROTC lone island in sea of budget cuts

By Rachel Smith
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Students attending public higher education institutions in Massachusetts are experiencing the repercussions of recent budget cuts. Governor Jane Swift recently reduced funding for the MassGrant program and public universities such as the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Locally, school sponsored budget cuts have affected academics, student affairs and most recently athletics. One program that has been unaffected by the state budget crunch is the UMass Reserve Officer Training Corps, or ROTC program. According to Army 2nd Lieutenant Kyle St. Laurent, ROTC recruiter, the program is relatively immune to the Commonwealth's monetary woes.

"We do get assistance from the University, but since it's a state school, a land grant school, there has to be an ROTC on campus," St. Laurent said. "We will never get cut."

Aside from being a mandatory program at UMass, ROTC is relatively inexpensive for the school or even the state to maintain. The program receives no state military funds and only negligible assistance from UMass, according to Army Major Bernd F. Schleimann, professor of military science.

"We provide all of the salaries for all of the professors that teach military science courses," explained Schleimann. "The seven of us that are here are paid for by the United States Army."

"We teach for free and we provide scholarship dollars," Schleimann continued. "We survive using our own resources. I get a budget from the U.S. Army for instructional material, uniforms, equipment, and training. All of those things are paid for by the Army, not the University or the state."

The ROTC program brings roughly $200,000 of scholarship money into the University each year, according to Schleimann. That means students who rely on financial aid from the ROTC program have little to worry about.

"Our scholarships actually increased when tuition and fees increased," St. Laurent commented.

"Really I don't see a whole lot of impact on the cadets," Schleimann said. "We may lose some money for things like brochures and mail-outs, but our scholarships will not be affected."

Although there is no initial commitment in the ROTC program, the Corps' ultimate goal is recruitment of officers for the reserve and active components of the United States Army, or Air Force in the case of AFROTC. In order to get paid, cadets have to accept a commission as an officer in the U.S. military and a minimum service obligation of four to 10 years in AFROTC and eight years in Army ROTC.

"The only way to get paid is when they apply for and receive a scholarship," explained Schleimann. "If you decide the Army is what you want to do and you sign on the dotted line you get paid."

While state financial aid may be more difficult for some students to get next semester, the ROTC scholarship will remain the same. However money alone shouldn't entice UMass students to become cadets.

"The ROTC program is not for everyone," Schleimann said. "If they have an interest in serving in the National Guard or U.S. Army Reserve or even want to learn something about leadership, there's no initial commitment. It's something to try, but its not going to suit everyone. I'm not going to encourage everyone to try it if they have absolutely no interest in it."

Students who are interested in military service but don't want to commit to ROTC can join the Massachusetts National Guard and receive a tuition waiver, but only the ROTC scholarship will pay for both tuition and fees. Students can find more information about educational benefits through military service in the Air or Army National Guards is posted at www.state.ma.us/guard/index.htm.

thanks is ridiculous. We're going to keep the pressure on so that they can take responsibility for their fair share."

On Wed. March 13, debate arose within the Senate around the Radical Student Union and their fliers for guest speaker Ned Ignatiev's talk on the abolition of the white race. Senator Ian Trefethen and member of the RSU explained that Senator Zack Spilman brought up the content of the fliers as being racist, and therefore suggested that the RSU be abolished. Members of the RSU responded last night to the allegations made at the last Senate meeting in explaining that the allegations were made by members who did not attend the actually event.

"The flier advocating the abolition of the white race is not racist and is not hateful," Katie Eident said.

She further explained that the white race cannot be defined as a race, culturally or biologically, and their intent for bring Ignatiev to speak at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst was in an effort to inspire, encourage and participate in an anti-racist dialogue.

"We will continue to critically analyze and resist racism in society and on this campus and we further encourage further dialogue around this issue," Eident said.

Spilman was unavailable to comment at press time.

One motion was placed from committee onto the agenda requesting the right for the SGA's Coordinating Council to have the ability to appoint elections commissioners to the elections committee. Under the SGA Constitution the Senate can only appoint members to the committee. Saunders explained that passing this motion would free the Senate from being held responsible for having a lack of elections commissioners come fall's Senate elections.

"This is why we went to trial in the fall of 2000 and this motion will make it right. Without passing this motion were going up a creek without a paddle," Saunders said.

The Senate unanimously passed the motion.

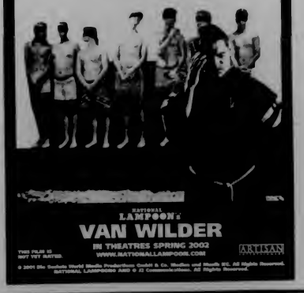
animals like crows, orangutans, monkeys and hyenas. "The Black characters are always dancing and jiving." In a scene in The Jungle Book the orangutan Louis sings, "I wanna walk like you, talk like you," to the human child. Pulisani interprets this as all of Disney's Black animal characters, who want to be human, but are inferior. Disney's portrayal of Hispanics was also considered negative.

"Why are they always portraying us [Hispanic people] as Chihuahuas," asked commentator Marisa Peralta. She was referring to the dogs in Oliver and Lady and the Tramp who spoke with a Mexican accent and loved to get into trouble.

Aladdin was challenged by many Arab-Americans, who believed that Disney perpetuates the stereotype of the barbaric Middle East. In the opening song, a Middle Eastern trader sings of his land, "It's barbaric, but hey, it's home." In response to Disney's refusal to address the protesting groups, a controversial editorial titled, "It's Racist, But Hey, It's Disney" was published by the New York Times in the mid-1990s.

This editorial summed up the spirit of the whole film, which ended with commentators stating that Disney has the responsibility to fix all of the stereotypes it has perpetuated for six decades.



In the discussion that followed the film, students and town members debated whether or not Disney movies, combined with other forms of media were responsible for the stereotypes that exist in the minds of so many Americans. "Disney movies are a representation of the typical American education level," Greta Stevenson, a School of Management student stated, implying that Disney was a symptom, and not a cause. A popular opinion was that parents should let their kids watch Disney movies, and step in to explain to their children which parts were accurate and which parts were made up.

"But do you tell a 5-year-old that whites exterminated the Native American people?" questioned Jon Olly, a senior history major. "At what point do we separate fact and fantasy in their minds?"

Happy Birthday Catherine

Governor's race: mudslinging begins

The 2002 Massachusetts Governor's race, is it a fact, a contest rooted solely in the legitimate concerns of our candidates, or is it simply fiction, a playing for those individuals to outdo each other rather than do anything for us?

Once again, it's looking more and more like the latter.

When Republican acting Governor Jane Swift surprised the Commonwealth last week by announcing her withdrawal from the next elections, the greatest enthusiasm was placed on an already unsure platform. The timing of her statement, which cited family as the motivating factor to vacate the office, coincided with the splashy reentry of Mitt Romney, President/CEO of the Salt Lake Olympics and target of Senator Edward Kennedy in the 1994 Senate race.

His charges painted on Romney in that particular mudslinging event colored him a single-minded candidate who, as the ads reminded us time and again, put profits over people."

The numbers behind those particular accusations seemed to stand up: his Bain Capital investment firm saw two of its investments – Staples, and a Midwestern steel company – go without healthcare for employees and on strike, respectively. This while Bain Capital paid Romney some $11 million over a two-year period, an act that spoke significantly louder than Romney's campaign promises ever could have.

Now, it's eight years later and Romney has fallen back into the Massachusetts political ring; what's changed?

From the looks of it, not much.

Already there are the same promises, the same vows to fight for a state that, frankly, Romney has spent little of his recent time in. Shouldn't a prime candidate to lead our State be more intimate with the daily life of the citizens he's trying to lead, rather than having to play catch up for the items he's missed?

His motivations, like any candidates, should be considered and criticized accordingly. While the rest of the field shapes up – Senate President Thomas Birmingham, a Democrat, and former US labor secretary Robert Reich are among the mix – Romney has opted for center stage and must deal with the resulting press attention.

He has to prove that he's more than a businessman, that he has a knowledge of exactly what this state needs of him and, most importantly, that he can competently deal with the people and problems of the commonwealth. Governing entails much more than running a business and employing countless faceless employees.

Whatever he knows of us, though, we're sure to learn plenty about him in the coming weeks. Until then, we'll wait anxiously for an alternate set of ideals to step up to the table.

Mitt a mystery man

DAN LAMOTHE

It's an old story. A dashing man rides in on a white steed and promises to fix all the problems. He comes from a famous family. Everything he touches turns to gold. But who the heck is he?

With Mitt Romney making his decision to run for governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts from his ridiculously plush Belmont thousands of Massachusetts residents have been jumping for joy.

Why? It's simple. He's not Jane Swift.

That in itself is something worth throwing a party for. Having Romney on the ballot instead of Swift gives us an actual choice for governor this year. Because obviously, no one was voting for Swift. Her pale puffy behind was sliced and diced a long time ago.

So, great. We've got another option. Mitt Romney, budget balancer extraordinaire. Fearless leader of the Winter Olympics. Successful businessman. Harvard Law School graduate. An all-around swell guy. Cue the sappy all-American music, please.

Is anyone else missing something?

Perhaps, like, how the hell is he going to fix this mess that is Massachusetts?

Make no bones about it. When Mitt Romney or any other of the Democratic candidates becomes governor of Massachusetts, they're starting at the bottom of a deep, dark hole. Our job as voters is deciding which one of the talking heads who have announced themselves as candidates has the best plan to climb out of it.

"...just because he looks slick doesn't mean he will be as governor."

So. What's the plan, buddy?

What do we know about Mitt Romney right now? We know he's Republican. We know that he's standing behind the tax cuts that governors past have put into place. We know that he's promised to cut the "fat" out of our budget and to get all of the money necessary to run the state back by balancing our budget instead of raising taxes.

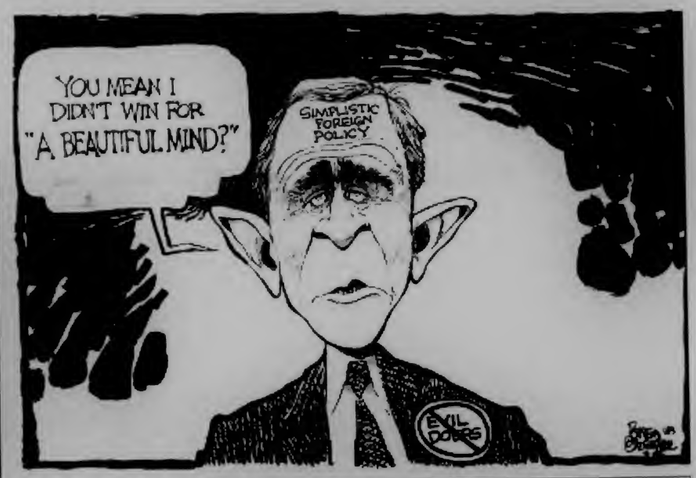
These things are all well and good. Or they're not. It's immaterial this early in the election process.

What matters right now is that Mitt Romney is making promises without any kind of plan. He's promised to improve the environment, bring more jobs to Massachusetts, and balance our budget. These things are good. These are things that we want to hear, and good ol' pretty boy Mitt knows that.

They mean nothing without a plan, a plan, a plan.

So now the questions have to start rolling. HOW are you going to "root out" fat in our budget, Mr. Romney? WHERE are you going to start looking for that fat? WHY do you think it will be so easy to do?

Much has been made of Romney's stage presence. His easy manner. His ability to be smoooooth, if you will. That isn't a bad thing.



There's nothing run with having a governor who's a little bit slick. It could actually be a welcome change, taking into consideration the fat chick with the bad laugh, helicopter, and no respect that was in office.

But just because he looks slick doesn't mean he will be as governor. There's nothing saying James Bond would have made a good governor, and I think that's what a lot of people are expecting here.

This isn't Utah anymore, Toto. This is the big leagues. Massachusetts is in a major mess. Smiles and promises have no substance. Jane Swift loved trying to be funny. Look where it got her.

Mitt Romney could very well turn out to be a fine governor. But no one should just hand him the job without hearing what he has to say. We just don't know how he'll do with the pressure here. What he did with the Winter Olympics is commendable, and it does weigh in as a factor here. But it's a different game being played in Beantown than in Salt Lake. Let's see what Mitty's got to say.

Fences are all around here at UMass

ERIC MARTIGNETTI

They're appalling. I think I've hate fences [illegible] an ample next door neighbor put a fence, facing the [illegible] between his yard and ours. Tommy Mac, as I [illegible] for him, owned the car dealership off route [illegible] 9 that now belongs to his son. Anyway, in [illegible] Gloria hit the Northeast, and Tommy Mac's [illegible] fence, which was about as old as he is [illegible] was severely damaged.

A few days later, Tommy boy came over to our house and [illegible] did about what he claimed was a rampaging [illegible]. Despite the fact that the fence was clearly [illegible] an unforeseeable act of nature, Tommy Mac [illegible] the guilt on [illegible] "the kids" for crippling his fence by [illegible] throwing it with a basketball. Supposedly, a four-[illegible] set to playing basketball in the drive.

My dad [illegible] things was a more powerful [illegible] than Mother Nature herself.

Tommy warned my dad to pass for half [illegible] a request as laughable as a Mike Tyson pre-[illegible] a good conference. I'm not exactly sure what my father's [illegible] was, but I'm willing to bet it included a few explet[illegible] doesn't repeat here.

Nevertheless, ever since this incident, I have always [illegible] fences. So when I was walking from my class in Fitzpatrick's class on Mahar yesterday, I became angry. What [illegible] a five-minute walk became a marathon attempt to [illegible] around the fence.

Conveniently, there is only one passageway thorough which [illegible] can take place. A makeshift opening through the handicap parking lot adjacent to the Fine Arts Center [illegible] always out. I surmised that the walk would not be [illegible] obnoxious after that point. That's where things got interesting. I turned toward Whitmore and found a fence. I pivoted around North Pleasant Street and was greeted by more [illegible] metal. Finally, I directed myself toward the side of the School of Management opposite Mahar and saw light at the end of the tunnel... or so I thought.

I figured that since my class was on the other side of SOM, I could just cut through Isenberg's building and get to Mahar via a shortcut. Wrong! When I cut through SOM to the exit on other side, I was barricade by orange plastic fencing. It was not as sturdy as the metal stuff, but it did come in a convenient nightglow color. I was forced to make yet another 180 and exited via the same door I had just entered. I continued along the infinitely long fence on the wrong side of SOM.

About eight times on this excursion I seriously pondered just jumping the garish fence, but I resisted temptation. The tour of Amherst on this overcast day would continue left onto University Drive at which point I either almost-stopped and asked for directions or made a B-line to Antonio's instead of class. A slice of chicken bbie palpable. I took a left back onto the path that would eventually lead me to Mahar. Throughout the expedition, I asked myself why the fence was the fence was unnecessarily large, as it encompassed an area approximate in size to the state of Rhode Island. I also wanted to know why there was only one gap in the fence through which travel was allowed.

I thought the whole situation metaphoric. UMass is being fenced in literally and figuratively. Budget cuts have fenced us in and there is no easy route through them. On one side of the fence was the construction of a new edition to the SOM building. On the other side was the Hatgis Mall where Hatgis Hoopla won't be held next year. There are seemingly fences to negotiate campus wide, both academically and athletically. A lot of people just want to jump over the fence. I know I've wanted to jump it in a few cases as well. However, it's patience and perseverance that allows one to overcome the obstacles. Budget cuts are a titanic fence, but we should not let them trap us in. Keep up the fight and speak out. Eventually, the fence will be tamed.

With a little luck, we can defeat the miserly Tommy Macs of the world and make it a better place for four-year-olds everywhere to play a game of driveway basketball.

Letters to the editor

Newman and Race

Dear Editor:

I myself have also been struggling with the horrifying events that have taken and are taking place [in the Catholic Church]. But I would hope that in presenting your opinions of the matter you would make sure your facts were correct. Saying that all the Newman Center has done is to say "pray" is not accurate and makes it evident that not much time was put into research.

If there had been research, it would have been easy to note that Newman spent time preparing an information session to help all those who are struggling with the issues of sexual abuse within the Catholic Church. All were welcome, it was advertised in the same way all Newman activities are. It was hosted by two UMass psychology professors that gave people background on pedophilia and the facts of the disease. Different backgrounds of priests and religious were present along with students of UMass and adults from the Amherst community. Many ideas were confronted and explored. All present were given time to freely express their own beliefs and feelings on the matter.

This issue has not been ignored by Newman. It is a huge tragedy and changes need to be made, but please be fair in recognizing that the Newman Center is doing what it can to help our community and know they are open to ideas that would better serve the need within our community.

Sincerely,
Julie Matta

Dear Editor:

The civil rights movement of the sixties fought for the equality of all men and women. Today in our classrooms, teachers' revere upon how far we have come and where we stand today. United we stand seems to be the cliché that the sheep, I mean people, keep using. In my 25 years of existence as a white male, I haven't seen too many changes other than the fact that racism and oppression are kept silent. If you go around demonstrating your hate for minorities, then you're a bigot, but if you tell a black joke at a dinner table with friends and family, hell, you're a funny guy.

This hypocritical way of acting is as real today as the war going on in Afghanistan. On many occasions I've been subjected to this silent racism by people who think that because I share their skin tone, I must share in their bigotry. The sad thing is that of all the times I've been put into these situations, seldom have I told the person how I really feel about their comments. Never have I laughed at one of these jokes. But then again, I also didn't tell the person why I believed that they were wrong. The times I have told the person that they were wrong and I didn't believe in their "racist" views, their response was that they were not racist either. It was "just a joke."

"A joke doesn't have a punch line with the N word in it. Nor does a joke demean a certain race."

After saying something like this to the joke teller, I'd been the one viewed by the room as though I were crazy. What it comes down to be is that every last one of us human beings is a hypocrite in some way or another. Some of us are far worse than others, but we all are. For instance, a mother tells her child not to fight with other children, even if the other child is the instigator. But in a larger spectrum, it's all right to go into another country and kill individuals that you never had a quarrel with before.

You'll be considered patriotic if you commit bloodshed in another country, but you're a murderer if you do it within our borders. Racism starts at the dinner table and goes right up the ladder as high as the White House. The higher up the racism goes, the more silenced it becomes. I guess I'd call that the American way. Please don't label me as an American, a white man, or a follower of any religion. Every one of those labels separates us from what we truly are: Planetary citizens.

Sincerely,

Drink lots and lots of sweet, sweet booze!

By Kurt Polesky
COLLEGIAN LEROUX NWIGGLER

College and booze go hand in hand. Like peanut butter and jelly, the movies and popcorn, or Ja Rule and J'Lo, they are the perfect match. So here it is, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, your source for boozing in the Pioneer Valley, presents "The Guide to Boozing." Sure, the list is all opinion, but it's my opinion.

Best Beer: Coors Light a.k.a. The Silver Bullet — Brewed with the taste of the Rockies, it's cold, refreshing Coors Light. Forget about the fact that the family that owns Coors is a bunch of fascists, they brew one heck of a beer. Who wants that skunky "real beer" taste when you can have this stuff?

Worst Beer: Coors Extra Gold — Brewed with the taste of the bottom of the toilet bowl, it's nasty Coors Extra Gold. Don't be tricked by the affordable price (as low as $10.49 for a thirty pack), this is some rank stuff. Tastes similar to armpit juice.

Best Mixed Drink: Long Island Iced Tea, baby — Representing ladies with big hair, the New York Islanders, Rosie O'Donnell and Bill O'Reilly comes the "Long Island Iced Tea." The perfect start to a night of boozing, you'll feel warm and fuzzy in no time. I don't know exactly what's in it, but there is a lot of booze.

Worst Mixed Drink: The Orange Crush Bomb — Invented by me during a summer of bartending, this drink combines orange juice, 7Up, and cheap vodka. It is disgusting, but everybody should try it once.

Best Drink Deal in Town: $1.75 Whisky and Coke at The Spoke — Also Seven O's has got some mighty cheap draft beer specials, including Busch on tap. It's not often you see that.

Best Drinking Game: Flip Cup, by far — Flip Cup is a superior drinking game to almost all others because it involves large numbers of people participating in an active manner at the same time. It's not a game of dumb luck like Asshole, or one in which only a few people at a time can compete like Beer Pong. Want to really have a kick ass game? Try "Survivor Flip Cup," in which the "weakest link" of the team is voted off round by round.

Worst Drinking Game: Asshole — Let's sit around a table and play cards at a party...not. It seems like once these games start they never end. Plus, the very premise of the game is stupid. If I lose I have to drink...no! Isn't that the reason I am here to begin with?

Best Post-Boozing Snack: Big Italian Sausage Sub from a street vender — Yea, Antonio's is good, no doubt, but I think most people would agree that the ultimate cap off to a night of drinking is having a big Italian sausage in your mouth. Better yet, how about representing Poland with a Kielbasa sub?

Most Underrated Hard Liquor (s): 100 Proof Peppermint Schnapps by Leroux, or 99 Proof Banana Schnapps — Both of these are truly lethal. A shot of Peppermint Schnapps gives you that fresh "I just brushed my teeth" feeling just before you vomit.

What was the first thing people said to you when they heard you were going to UMass?

"So I hear you're going to UMass. Good old ZooMass, BoozeMass, the Zoo." Did they just refer to it as another party school?

Now, I'm not saying that not everyone here at the University of Massachusetts drinks heavily and spends their weekends recovering from the night before, relying on digital pictures and video recorded hijinks for memories.

Not all of us were drinkers when we came here our freshman year. We carried along the philosophy dictated to us from after-school specials: "I don't need to drink to have a good time." However, as soon as we realized that there really isn't anything to do in Western Mass. except hit the bottle, many of us have become accustomed to and have our personal favorite drinking game.

These are some of the trademark UMass drinking games (writers note: I do not support in any way shape or form underage drinking, however if you happen to have a thirty rack of Keystone Light and you need to kill time before that really awesome party at Sig Ep, where it doesn't start until 10 and costs seven bucks for guys and fifty cents for girls, then by all means please follow these instructions).

CARD GAMES

ASSHOLE

A staple of any college drinking community, this card game is usually the first thing taught to new drinkers. Basically it works out like this: after dealing out all the cards, competitors then try to get rid of all their cards one at a time.

The value of the cards is pretty obvious; black threes are the lowest and the ace is the highest card. Why just black threes you ask? Well because two's and red three's are what they call "clear cards," meaning that if you hold any of these cards in hand and you are not happy with the cards on the table, you can throw the card down and start anew.

The steadfast rule is that the card that you put down must be higher or the same as the card put into play by the person in front of you. If the card that you put down is the same as the previous card, the person in front of you loses a turn and is forced to drink from his/her beverage. The first person out is the president and the last person out is the "asshole." That person must reshuffle and re-deal all the cards to the players. With the cards he has he then must give his two best cards (clear cards first then the face cards and then the high number cards) to the president and accept the two worst cards from the president. The game continues until everyone is sufficiently trashed or another drinking game wants to be played.

There can also be house rules in play (the house can dictate the rules at the beginning) like "complete the social," which is when you have the ability to throw down the remaining cards that would have all four of the same face or numerical cards on the table, then everyone must drink and the deck clears to you.

Kings (A.K.A. Circle of Death)

Removing the jokers from the deck spread the cards around the base of a beer or cup full of a beverage of your choice. Each player pulls a card and the cards have a value system. Red two's and three's mean you take two or three seconds worth of beer. Black two's and three's mean you give two or three seconds with of beer to

COLLEGIAN LUSH

We've all been there: it's 10 a.m., the sun is peeking through your blinds, and it feels as though the Blue Man Group is doing a command performance in your head. Your stomach hurts, and you ache all over. You're hung over, and you have no one to blame but yourself. Well, stop feeling sorry for yourself and kick that hangover!

What is a hangover?

There are several ways to cure a hangover, but first, it's important to understand what causes a hangover. The simple answer is booze and lots of it. The more scientific and intelligent answer is that alcohol dehydrates your system. Your body also produces enzymes to flush out the toxins that are produced when your liver processes the liquor — this isn't a fast process, so your body is also reacting to toxins in your system. Plus, after a night of heavy drinking, you never get a good night's rest. Booze messes with your mind, meaning that when you are awake, you stumble, trip over your words, see double and think that you can actually sing. When you're asleep it still messes with you; your brain can't properly regulate your sleep and you don't enter rapid eye movement sleep. This means that you wake up the next day still feeling exhausted.

The worst symptom of a hangover is the nausea. If you feel like you're going to boot, do it. It's fast way of getting rid of the bad stuff. Just remember to do it in the proper place: toilet, trashcan, bush outside of Colonial Village, etc.

How to avoid a hangover

The best way to avoid a hangover is not to drink at all. (Editor's note: Boo!!!) If you do drink, then drink responsibly, and in moderation. Also, eat food before, during and after drinking. The food will help absorb the alcohol. Drinking on an empty stomach is not recommended. Be smart when you choose your drinks, too. Avoid carbonated or fizzy drinks. These will hit you faster and harder, making you feel sicker quicker. Don't mix a lot of different drinks — your body gets used to breaking down one type of booze at a time.

Alcohol also contains congeners. These are things that are basically left over in the distilling process. They are what give liquor its flavor and color. For some reason, liquors with a lot of congeners produce hangovers more severe than booch with out a lot of congeners. The simple rule is the darker the drink the more congeners it has. Bourbons, whiskeys, rums and brandies have more congeners than gins or vodkas. White wine has less congeners than red wine. (Editor's note: Avoid the burgundy.) The more times a drink is distilled also reduces congeners. Look for "triple distilled" on the labels. And it's no big surprise that the cheaper the bottle the worse a hangover is going to be if you drink too much of it. Best drink for avoiding hangovers is good vodka. It should have almost no smell and no taste. Steer clear of that bottle of Ruhinoff and splurge for the Grey Goose. Too much Goose will still give you a hangover though.

I hate you, DJ Clue

If I ever meet DJ Clue, I'm going to punch him in the face.

DJ Clue is the worst DJ in the universe. He shouldn't even be allowed to hold the title "DJ." They should just call him "Clue," as in, "doesn't have one."

Ever since we got a cable modem at my house, I've been a downloading fiend. I have about 1200 songs on my hard drive. And I got a CD burner for Christmas so I am a mega-mix-making-machine. Naturally in order to craft the perfect party mix I have to find the best pop and dance songs. So I go to Kazaa or Audiogalaxy and I click on the latest jams like Fat Joe and Ashanti's "What's Luv" or the la Rule, Cadillac Tah and J Lo remix of "Ain't it funny." However, I have made a very disturbing and frustrating discovery. It is extremely hard to find a version of the song that both contains the swear words (radio edits suck), and does NOT contain some crappy screaming from that ASShole DJ Clue.

I know I'm not the only one who wants to poison DJ Clue's Krystal. Let me describe what makes him so terrible. First of all, when you download a song that featuring DJ Clue, it doesn't say so on the song title. You think you're downloading a pure version without DJ Clue's obnoxious yelling. However, when you go to listen to the song, you're bombarded with this incessant whooping throughout the entire track! In the beginning it's "Now Ja Rule, Fresh Out...DJ CLUE!" And then approximately every 15 to 30 seconds throughout the rest of the song the artist fades out so that Clue can come on again and yell something along the lines of "DJ CLUE," or "DESERT STORM" or "NEW SHIT." You can't listen to the actual song because he won't shut up. And the song itself is really quiet. This happened to me the other day. I downloaded "Livin It up" by Ja Rule and burned it onto a disc before listening to it. Stupid me. I put it on in my car and had to turn up la Rule because he was so quiet. Then, all of a sudden, out of the blue, my ears and speakers were blown out when DJ Clue starts yelling his signature crap. Why can't I just download the song without some stupid DJ Clue ruining it?

I don't know how he's made a career as a DJ. I mean, maybe he is a good pop producer. He seems to work with lots of popular artists with good songs. He did one of my favorite tracks, Mariah Carey's "Honey" remix. That wasn't so bad. But lately he's been out of control. Who lets him dub his screaming over a good song anyway? Whoever Clue's boss is needs to stop snorting coke and face that crap cake. Seriously, he's ruining pop music and my downloading high.

And I know that there are other producers out there who feature themselves in their artist's songs and videos. Hello, P. Diddy was totally in every Biggie video, and even muttered stuff on some of his cuts. And Diddy works with lots of artists that allow him a certain level of selfish freedom over their music. But I must say, to Diddy's credit, he isn't nearly as annoying and pushy as DJ Clue. If I were P. Diddy I'd be pissed at Clue for giving DJs and producers a bad name. If I were P. Diddy, I'd punch DJ Clue in the face in front of Carson Daly on TRL. If I were the director of programming for the Fox network, I would got P. Diddy or Pete Rock to get in the ring with DJ Clue for Celebrity Boxing and get the entire American television watching public to watch Diddy or Rock beat the "desert storm" out of Clue and end his stupid DJ career.

I saw Clue the other day hosting some random thing on MTV. He was with some VJ girl. He was acting like he was the hottest thing since D'Angelo in the "How Does it Feel" video. Guess what, he is one ugly Muthafka! I was like, "you've got to be kidding me! THAT little runt is DJ Clue?" Seriously folks, he had a big ugly pimply face on a stumpy little body and looked more like an extra in the Michael Jackson Thriller video than a New York hip hop hotshot. I almost kicked the television. He was sitting there, with a big MTV mic in his hand, announcing videos, acting completely unaware of ruining pop music. Guiltless, DJ Clue. Ha! I hate you DJ Clue.

Oh, and another thing. Whenever I drive in or around New York City, one of my favorite places on earth and the birthplace of hip hop, I always listen to Hot 97. Okay, so it's just like Jam'n 94.5 in Boston or WKYS in D.C., but there's something about driving in NYC and listening to music that was made in the city. And Hot 97 usually serves up some phat jams. Driving music, you know. Anyway, did I mention that I hate DJ Clue? Yeah, not only did he ruin the songs that I download, but he also ruined the songs that I listen to when I'm bumpin' in Manhattan in my Maxima. His voice makes my ears bleed. I'll be listening to the radio and his show will come on or he'll do a guest spot, and the whole experience is ruined. And on top of that, he doesn't even play any good stuff on his show. It's all repeat of the same played out crap that I can hear in Boston or even on the Hartford station, Hot 93.7. If he's really at the forefront of the future of hip hop and a trailblazer in the genre, then why is he ginning the same tired old shit every one else has already done? DJ Clue should not, under any circumstance, have his own show on Hot 97. The ratings of that station would increase exponentially if he were removed from the airwaves.

All he does is yell and try to "remix" songs. Remix? If by "remix" you mean spend the first 20 seconds of each song yelling his name and then stopping the song several times to shout other meaningless garbage, Desert Storm? What is that? He must either be some crazy narcissist arrogant bastard who is so full of himself that he assumes that everyone wants to hear his shouting rants, or he has absolutely no self-esteem whatsoever that requires him to act out in order to try and gain reassurance from those around him. It should not surprise me one bit if his penis is the size of cooked, limp penne noodle.

DJ Clue is a menace to society and all pop music. Someone please take away his turntables. Wait, I'm sure he doesn't use turntables; he probably just has an old AIWA with a microphone plugged into the side. A real DJ is someone who lets the songs speak for themselves, or if they remix, they plug in a different beat, or switch up the hook. A real DJ comes up with their own beats. DJ Babu, DJ Premier, DJ Hi Tek, DJ Abilities and all of the Beat Junkies. These are real original DJs with real talent. DJ Clue is a hack. DJ Clue sucks. And for all you downloaders out there, please take those crappy DJ Clue remixes off of your harddrives! Let's stop the cycle of crap. I hate you, DJ Clue. And I hate your whole evil empire!

Drink water between drinks. This will help — but won't completely — offset the dehydrating effects of liquor.

How to cure a hangover

So you've ignored all of my sage advice and had too much to drink, and now you're in pain. Unfortunately, there is no real cure for a hangover. There is no panacea that will magically transform you from the sallow, despicable form you are now to the bright-eyed bundle of energy you were before you started drinking.

There are a few cures to avoid, however. Don't drink coffee in an attempt to sober up. This won't work. Caffeine will just keep you up, and make you have to go to the bathroom more. Showers don't help either. You know how when you stay too long in the shower, your fingers "prune" up? This is because you are losing more water. It's called osmosis. Look it up. Anyway, you're already dehydrated enough after nine 151 and Cokes, so smarten up. Bloody Marys do not help either. They taste good, but they really don't cure a hangover.

Drink lots of water. You have to replace all the fluids you lost being Booze Boy the Bar King. Take a painkiller — a legal one — for the aches and pains the next day. Do not take it before you go to bed or pass out. And now that you've woken up with a hangover, go back to sleep. Since you aren't drunk anymore, you'll be able to sleep regularly.

Finally, let this experience be a lesson to you. Alcohol is a thing, and like any other thing it can be abused. Drink in moderation, and never ever drink and drive — or a hangover will be the least of your worries.

anybody. When a four is pulled the last person to touch the floor drinks, when a five is drawn the last person with their hand in the air drinks, when a six is pulled the last person to touch their nose (in a picking motion, however, no contact of nail and nostril must be made, that, after all would be disgusting) drinks. Seven gives the player the ability to distribute the seven seconds to any of the other players. Eight the player picks a rule that must be followed for the rest of the game, any violation of the rule will constitute a drink. A nine means that a rhyme is started and the first person to not come up with a rhyme drinks. Ten allows the player to pick a category and then each person must come up with a subject for that category. You guessed it: the person that can't drinks. Jacks send the drink back to the player in front of you. Queens mean that you can only speak in questions, the first person that doesn't drinks. Aces are waterfalls. And finally the Kings. When a King is pulled they are put aside, however pulls the last one finishes the beer or whatever alcohol is in the cup.

FUCKED

Now before you report me to the MPAA and give this article a PG-13 rating, let me explain. Eight cards are put down in two separate rows, four in each row. On the left you have take one, take two, take four, take eight and on the right give one, give two, give four, give eight. On solitary card is put above the two rows. This is the "FUCKED" card. Then whoever is playing gets asked four questions: 1) Red or black (referring to the color of the card), 2) High or low (higher or lower than the previous card), 3) in-between or out (if the card will be in the two previous cards or out), 4) suite (what is the suite of the next card). This sequence of guessing serves two purposes select your four cards, and get you good and drunk. Because for every thing you get wrong you drink the number on the card. The rest of the game is easy. If you have any of the cards that get flipped from the give pile, you give to any player. If your cards any of those from the take, you drink. The "FUCKED" card means you start and finish a full drink.

SPORTS

BEER PONG

Ah yes, the staple of college drinking games. Can be played one on one or two on two. For fun or in tournament style. Take between 12 and 18 cups and place them in a triangle. Simply throw a beer pong ball into the opposing teams cup. If you sink it, they drink it. Done. Now of course there are house rules that differ from house to house and playing field to playing field, but the basics remain the same

Drinking and TV

There are some things that are just meant to go together. TV and beer are two of them.

The Dawson's Creek Drinking Game

Drink every time any character says something uncharacteristic of a normal 17 year old.

The Bob Newhart Show Drinking Game

Everytime some says "Bob," drink

The Final Four Drinking Game

With the college basketball tournament winding down this weekend in the Final Four, this game seems very timely. Brought to my attention by Christian Curley and Michael Davidson for this yearly sports event. Two people select a team in the same game. So say you have Maryland and your friend picked Kansas. Every time Kansas score a basket you drink a shot of beer. At the end of the game, the loser needs to drink the equivalent to the point differential. Without a doubt a worthwhile drinking event.

So there you have it members of the UMass drinking community.

I pity these games and if you can think of any others, share them with us, because nothing brings people closer than binge drinking in a small room.

How to make your fantasies come true

So you're bored on a Tuesday night. There's nothing going on in your dorm, and you just don't feel like studying for that psych exam coming up. Go sign up online for a fantasy baseball draft. Fantasy baseball, you say? Isn't that just for Internet geeks with way too much time on their hands?

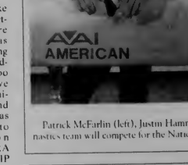
Well it is, but it's also for any baseball fan that wants to make the season a bit more exciting. From novice to superfan leagues, there is a myriad of opportunities for fantasy baseball across the Internet. But what if you've never seen a draft room before, or you think WHIP is something you crack across a person's back? (It's actually the ratio defined as the sum of walks and hits divided by innings pitched). Have no fear, gentle reader. Here are some tips to ensure your fantasy team doesn't look like the Tampa Bay Devil Rays.

First, everyone in your league will undoubtedly know the top players available, so try to familiarize yourself with guys that can be taken in the later rounds. After the A-Rods, the Giambis, and the Ichiros are taken off the board, some fantasy players will be clueless as to what to do next. If you're well-versed with the likes of Jose Vidro, Pat Burrell, and Garret Anderson to pick up in the middle to late rounds, you'll be well on your way to developing a solid team.

Next, absolutely, positively, do not draft players based strictly on name recognition or what they did in any year other than 2001. Many new players will grab guys like Omar Vizquel because of his dazzling glove, assuming that he can be productive at the plate. Vizquel quite possibly could be one of the worst fantasy players available, judging by his laughable home run totals, his mediocre average, and his lack of productivity in any category besides fielding percentage. Avoid picking guys with "Ken Caminiti syndrome" in which the player's name supercedes any talent he may have once had. Tim Salmon, Robin Ventura, Eric Karros, and Barry Larkin may have been solid in their prime, but their fantasy value is close to zero for this upcoming season.

Make sure you're aware of any injuries players are recovering from, or any history of arm problems, knee problems, whatever, that they might have had. Although Pedro Martinez, Ivan Rodriguez, and Ken Griffey, Jr. are all bound for tremendous seasons, there's a looming risk that their seasons might be cut short due to various ailments. If you're worried about potential lineup disruptions, consider passing on them to take Barry Zito, Paul Lo Duca, and Adam Dunn a couple rounds later.

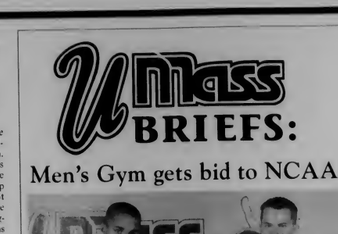
For each closer you draft, be aware of the set-up man or solid middle relief guy for his respective team. That way, if your prized stopper tears his rotator cuff or fails to close the door on opponents, you can pick up his team's new go-to guy and not miss a beat. Guys like Eddie Guardado, John Smoltz, and Byung-Hyun Kim didn't begin the year as their team's closer, but soon assumed the role. And yes, you should pick up Kim to fill your bullpen if he's available after the 14th round. Despite his horrendous performance in the World Series that will most likely define his career; Kim was more than solid down the stretch (19 saves with a WHIP just a shade over one).



And while we're at it, guys like Rich Garces and Jeff Nelson are pretty much worthless, unless you're competing in a league that has "holds" as a category. Despite being solid, these guys (just like most middle relief pitchers) won't see too many save opportunities, and are just as likely to balloon your ERA and WHIP totals as a closer is.

Keep yourself up-to-date on rookies making a big splash in spring training, or early in the season. Last year, Albert Pujols went from virtual obscurity to a fantasy stud after the first two weeks of the season. Already, several players are shaping up to become the darlings of 2002. Nick Johnson, Morgan Ensberg, and Sean Burroughs are all looking to wreak havoc on unsuspecting hurlers. Grab these guys quick if they start hot, before they disappear off the waiver wire.

And finally, whatever you do, don't let emotional attachments interfere with producing the best team possible. Even if you were the biggest Cal Ripken, Jr. fan (before he retired), you would have been crazy to draft him. Make no mistake, Ripken SUCKED as a fantasy player, despite being a hell of a guy. So to all you Sox fans, avoid Shea Hillenbrand, Rey Sanchez, and Dustin Hermanson, no matter how loyal you are to your team. The job is to produce the best team, not a bunch of guys you like. This night entail even drafting a couple guys from those sucky Yankees. Surprisingly, having Jason Giambi or Mariano Rivera doesn't conflict with your Yankee-hatred as much as you would think.



Following these guidelines might not make you a guaranteed winner, but you'll at least avoid embarrassing yourself during the draft and the season. After all, fantasy baseball ain't just for geeky fanboys anymore.

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's Gym gets bid to NCAAs

Patrick McFarlin (left), Justin Hammar and the rest of the UMass men's gymnastics team will compete for the National Championship.

Men's Gym

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team has been selected as one of 12 teams invited to the National Collegiate Men's Gymnastics Championships in Norman, Okla., the NCAA announced Tuesday. The competition will begin on Thursday, April 4 with the national qualifying competition and continue with the team and individual all-around national championships on Friday, April 5 and individual event finals on Saturday, April 6.

The Minutemen, who finished the season with an 11-1 overall record and a second-place finish at the Eastern College Athletic Conference, will be seeded 10th at the national event. This is the third-consecutive year that head coach Roy Johnson's squad has been invited to the national competition.

"This is a tremendous opportunity for the athletes on our team to show that we can compete on the national level," Johnson said. "We have a very good team and we have the ability to be one of the top six teams and advance to the national championships."

The individual event finals, which will be held on Saturday, April 6, will include the top eight individuals in each event from Friday night competition. This is the last season of competition for the team, which was eliminated earlier this semester to save money for the Athletic Department.

Men's Track

The University of Massachusetts men's outdoor track and field team was picked third in the pre-season Atlantic 10 coaches poll, and will open its season this weekend at the Husky Spring Open held Saturday, March 30th at the Solomon Track in Dedham, Mass., beginning at 10:00 a.m.

Junior sprinter Kwesi Frimpong-Boateng (Accra, Ghana) is coming off an indoor season where he won the 55M dash in six of the seven regular season meets, including a new school record of 6.30 seconds set at the Atlantic 10 Championships at Rhode Island Feb. 16.

Other post-season notables include performances from junior Ken Scheider (Wood Ridge, N.J.) who set a school record in the pole vault clearing 15'9.00, at the A-10 Championships. Sophomore John O'Neil (North Reading, Mass.) turned in an impressive 1:04.41 in the 500M dash, the fourth fastest time in school history, at the New England Championships on Feb. 22nd.

tance of this weekend's series especially after going 0-5 at Richmond last weekend.

"This is the biggest series to date," said Hourigan, knowing that a solid showing against the Colonials could help prove that last weekend's sweep at the hands of the Spiders was just a fluke.

The trio of games against GW will be UMass' first home series of the season.

The Minutemen played a lone game against Quinnipiac at home on March 9, as the team rode senior ace Jesse Santos to a 10-3 victory. The Chelmsford, Mass. native pitched seven scoreless innings for the Minutemen before handing the game over to the bullpen.

Junior Matt Boulanger and sophomore Adam Stojanowski each hit their first career home runs in the victory over QU.

The Maroon and White will host the Colonials in a doubleheader Friday and another game Saturday afternoon. Both days' activities begin at noon.

ARIES (March 23-April 19) – You can have things you want on schedule today, but you're going to have to look at major issues from a more practical standpoint at all times.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Today, you have what it takes to prevail in the face of formidable odds, but you may not know it. A late start lets you build much needed confidence.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may lack patience today, so you better warn those who are often more exuberant and disruptive than you can bear right now.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You're going to be more stubborn today than usual. Take care that you're not merely being contrary for the sake of it. Try to work with others.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You're not about to give up until the bitter end today – and by that time you may have gained just enough of an advantage to turn things around.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – A special gift may come your way today, but you're not likely to know what it is until someone tells you outright. Pay more attention!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Take care that you aren't so objective that you cannot be sympathetic toward those who really are "out in the cold." Have a heart!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – The more forthright and honest you can be today, the more likely you will be to reach your goals on schedule – without having to compromise.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – This is a good day to get more practical and realistic. The more you let yourself drift into dreamland, the less you'll accomplish.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You must be sure that you know what you're getting into when you accept an invitation from an Aries native. Is everything on the up-and-up?

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Someone is likely to face you with a challenge on the one hand and a choice on the other. Which you acknowledge is entirely up to you.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Why do you insist on telling only part of the story? Once you let it all out, you'll begin to feel better about the whole thing.

Bonnies scare Minutewomen

Barnes not pleased with UMass start

By Glen Straub
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A common downfall for any team is when it becomes difficult for its players to get motivated to play an opponent that is inferior on the talent scale. With nothing to prove, the desire to succeed has a tendency to be absent in the minds of the athletes.

UMass	11
St. Bonaventure	8

Yesterday at Richard F. Garber Field, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team showed signs of a possible downfall, when it narrowly defeated a lowly 1-5 St. Bonaventure club, 11-8.

The tough victory improved the Minutewomen's overall record to 5-2 and they are now undefeated in the Atlantic 10 with a 2-0 mark.

"We need to sharpen up at this point, but we are 2-0 in the conference and that's what counts," head coach Phil Barnes said.

The Minutewomen were able to build a 5-0 lead by halftime thanks in part to goals by juniors Leslie Pollock, Lydia Robinson and freshman Maura McGarrity.

Despite the lead, coach Barnes was not happy with how his team came out to play in the opening frame.

"In the first half we needed to come out with more energy," he remarked.

Fueled by their coach's demands, the Minutewomen opened the second half like it was an entirely new game.

Less than two minutes into the half, Pollock netted her second goal of the game to give UMass a 4-0 lead.

Following a score from SBU scoring-leader, Laura Spaulding, Pollack responded nearly a minute after her second score with her third and final goal of the game – making the tally 5-1.

"I haven't been shooting much the past couple of games, so I decided to take it on myself to score and shoot at every open opportunity," Pollack said. "If I get myself into scoring position, I know I can put it past the goalie."

Up until yesterday, the attacker from Watervliet, N.Y. had only scored two goals on the season. According to her coach her hard work in practice finally paid off in game play.

"Leslie [Pollock] really did a great job today," Barnes said. "She created a lot of opportunities for herself and her teammates."

"She works extremely hard in practice and today's performance was a direct result of her hard work," he added.

Once again, sophomore attacker Hope Zelinger proved to be a major part of the UMass offensive attack as she compiled a hat trick in the extended UMass run.

Her third goal of the game gave the Minutewomen a comfortable 10-3 lead with 17 minutes to go in the contest. The firing shot past the SBU goaltender was the sophomore attack's 15th goal of the season. She currently is the team-leader in goals scored.

Unfortunately, the inconsistent play of the Minutewomen caught up with them as sat on their lead and St. Bonnaventure started to creep back into the game toward the end of the second half.

"For the first 14 minutes of second half we came out with tremendous energy and we did a good job a building a lead," said Barnes of the 7-3 run. "However, for the last 15, we didn't focus on what we needed to do."

"We tend to play hard for ten minutes and then let down for the next ten," Pollock said.

With seven minutes remaining in the contest SBU midfielder Emily Lilyea put one past UMass goaltender Cyndi Doyle off a free position chance to cut the lead to 10-6.

UMass co-captain Jada Emery increased the lead once again by netting her ninth goal of the season four minutes later, making the score 10-6.

The Bonnies made one final push for a comeback victory when they scored two goals within 40 seconds of each other in just under three minutes. However, the Maroon and White took control of the final minute of play and did not a permit a tremendous comeback from the Bonnies.

"It is very important to get the win against an A-10 opponent," Pollock said.

UMass faces off with another A-10 foe this Friday as the Duquesne Dukes march into Amherst for an afternoon affair. The Minutewomen will look to improve on their subpar play the past couple of games.

"There some things we need to work on," Barnes said. "We could of done a better job, offensively and defensively today.

"Most importantly, we need to learn to keep the pressure on throughout the game," he added.

The Doctor's Final Four prescription

Atlanta turns into college basketball's hotbed as the Final Four hits the Georgia Dome. Three teams that many felt should be in the Final Four have made their way to the Peach State. Oklahoma, Maryland and Kansas. The other Indiana, went from the only No. 5 seed to survive the first round to the surprise of the tourney after knocking off Duke in the Sweet 16 and Kent State in the Elite Eight and helped get a General Sized-Gorilla off of the back of second seat head coach Mike Davis. However, the Hoosiers trek to an unlikely championship may be a brick wall in the National Semifinals.

Indiana vs. Oklahoma – The injury to Tom Coverdale, the South Regional's Most Outstanding Player, puts a definite link in the Hoosiers armor. As the main cog to the Hoosier backcourt Coverdale must play if IU wants to keep up with Hollis Price and the rest of the Sooner sharpshooters. Dane Fife, the Big Ten Co-Defensive Player of the year was spared being mentioned with the likes of Chris Webber, Bill Buckner and Mitch Williams in post season infamy with his near disastrous foul of Duke's Jason Williams. However, he now must face Price, who is playing his best when Oklahoma needs it the most (18 points vs. Missouri).

In the frontcourt, Jared Jeffries has held the fort for IU in the post including his monster 24-point, 15-rebound effort against the Blue Devils. However, Jeffries hasn't seen the likes of the OU frontcourt. Aaron McGhee and Jabahri Brown bring the bulk while Fife brings the necessary quickness to stop Jeffries and his mates.

Player to Watch – Vl Moye, Indiana – If Coverdale is not near 100 percent, the sophomore will have to be the man again, like he was against Duke, when he scored 14 points in just 17 minutes. More might be needed against the tough OU defense.

Prediction – Indiana has had a fantastic run to the Final Four, an unlikely run that has put Indiana back on the map in college basketball. However, the Hoosier train stops here. The game will be hotly contested throughout the first half, but that is when Oklahoma's defense becomes more smothering than any team in the nation this year. McGhee and company will make the difference down low and put the Sooners within one win of a national title. Score: Oklahoma 74, Indiana 59

Kansas vs. Maryland – This has the potential to be a shootout and a blood bath all rolled into one. Maryland had a stretch against UConn where it did not hit a field goal for five minutes; it still scored 90. Kansas had a stretch against Oregon where it just kept scoring and scoring and didn't stop until it hit triple digits. Juan Dixon and Steve Blake in the backcourt for the Terps against Kirk Hinrich and Jeff Boschee for the Jayhawks. That is the shootout.

The bloodbath will take place in the trenches between Lonnie Baxter, Chris Wilcox, the Maryland big men and Drew Gooden, Nick Collison and the Kansas Rock Chocks. Maryland took it to Connecticut inside, as Baxter and Wilcox combined for 42 points on Sunday while Collison and Gooden combined to out rebound Oregon in the Midwest Regional final 53-31.

Player to Watch – Blake, Maryland – His 3-pointer with less than 30 seconds left sunk the Huskies on Sunday. Those were also his first three points of the game. He is a great floor general, but against the number one offense in the country the Terps are going to need more than five points from him.

Prediction – The toughest game of the tourney to call. Maryland has played and beaten the likes of Duke and Connecticut three times this year. However, they have not played a team like Kansas. Speed plus power gets the Jayhawks to the title game. Score: Kansas 95, Maryland 89

Title Game – Kansas vs. Oklahoma – Before this tournament started, I had said that when Oklahoma beat Kansas in the Big XII championship game and held the Jayhawks to 57 points under their season average I thought it was the best thing for the Jayhawks to have a feeling of a loss before the tournament. Unfortunately for the Sooners, they will be the last team to see what I was talking about.

To say this game won't be close is being idiotic, and I have already made enough idiotic predictions to say it won't (If you don't think I have, remember Rams 28, Patriots 17, enough said). Oklahoma is too good of a team to allow that to happen. But Kansas is the better team and next Monday night, with Drew Gooden leading the way, coach Roy Williams will finally get the stigma of best coach never to win a National Championship and dispose of it for good. Score: Kansas 85, Oklahoma 73

Losing streak aborted

Skid ends at eight games

Senior Brian Hourigan pitched a complete game, striking out ten batters while scattering 12 hits to lead the Massachusetts baseball team (6-10, 0-3 Atlantic 10) to its first victory in nine games. The right-handed Beacon Falls, Conn. native gave up four runs, in UMass' 7-4 win at Hartford (3-10) yesterday afternoon.

UHart	4

Hourigan, who has pitched terrifically in the season's early stages, was quick to give his teammates the credit for his success against UHart.

"They played really good defense behind me," Hourigan said, also pointing out that it is much easier to pitch with the lead and the knowledge that the team was putting runs up on the scoreboard, two things the Minutemen were able to do well yesterday.

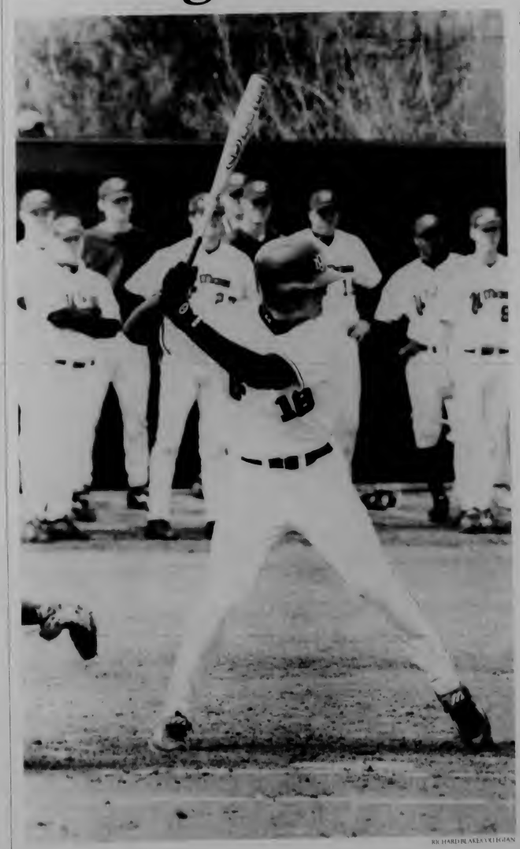
But the simple realization that the four earned runs he gave up raised his earned run average to 1.48 for the season proves how well he has pitched during the present campaign. In fact, those are the first four runs Hourigan has given up all season long.

Admitting that he had felt better on the mound at some earlier points in the season, Hourigan admitted, "I was pretty happy with the way I competed, I felt pretty good [on the mound]."

Sophomore shortstop Mike Athas, who went 2-for-4 in the contest, gave Hourigan a little more credit.

"Everything was moving today," said the Holyoke, Mass. native of Hourigan's pitches. "He was really hitting his spots well."

Aaron Senez, who has been tearing the cover off the ball, broke open a one-run game with two-run homerun in the top of the eighth inning, making the score 6-3 UMass. Senez is hitting .364 through the Maroon and White's first 16 games.



Each team added a run in the ninth inning.

The win was big for Coach Mike Stone's club, ending its eight-game losing streak while picking up some momentum into its second A-10 series of the year.

"We wanted to get rolling heading into the series with George Washington," Hourigan said.

Hourigan talked of the impor-

The Faculty Senate discussed the necessity for a solid writing program at yesterday's meeting.

Faculty Senate focuses on writing

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Faculty Senate voted yesterday to endorse the four recommendations of the University Writing Committee presented in their annual report.

The University Writing Committee, led by acting director Marcia Curtis, presented what many senators considered a substantial report on their program and its place within the University of Massachusetts.

"I was very impressed with the breadth of the report," said Senator Brain O'Connor. To which Senator Ronald Chilton later added, "I think every member of the Rules Committee was impressed by the report and recommendations."

The report explained how the University Writing Committee is organized and what the Committee's College Writing courses involve. In addition, it includes four recommendations made by the Committee to the Faculty Senate.

Motion 23-02 carried by the Faculty Senate requires the Faculty Senate to support the four recommendations made by the University Writing Committee. The first of which is to reduce the number of students in each of the College Writing courses. According to the Committee's report, sections of College Writing 111 during the Fall 2000 semester contain an average of 20 students, while sections of 112 hold about 24, and sections of 113 have 20. The Committee is recommending that they be allocated more funds in order to reduce the number of students in 112 and 113 to 20, and sections of 111 to only 15 students.

The report also recommends that improvements be made to the program's computer lab, used in 111 and 113. Funds would be used to replace the "noisy air conditioner," "provide window treatments to eliminate glare," and purchase additional computer hardware. In addition, the Committee would like to see their Writing Center fully funded by the University so that it may better serve the needs of students in all University courses.

Other recommendations made by the Committee include encouraging other courses across the colleges at UMass to incorporate more writing and the writing pedagogy of the College Writing courses in their curriculums, specifically General Education courses. Members of the Committee believe that use of the techniques taught in College Writing would be better sustained by students if they were used again in other courses.

"In some programs, students write few or no papers between College Writing and the Junior-Year Writing Program course. It is not surprising that these students are poor writers," states the report.

The Writing Program Committee repeated that they saw a need for more General Education courses to be writing-intensive so as to improve the quality of undergraduate writing.

Senator Charlie Moran supported this need by saying that every year he asked students how many papers they had written in their last semester's courses and received answers stating that "more than half had written no papers."

"That may be why by the time they get to my Junior-Year Writing course, half have forgotten what it takes to make a paragraph," said Senator

Heaven's Crossroads gives original perspective on Vietnam

By Jake Lilien
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the first screenings of Kimi Takesue's documentary Heaven's Crossroad was held at the University of Massachusetts on Wednesday night, where students packed Herter Auditorium to see one of the highlights of this year's Multicultural Film Festival. The event included commentary by the filmmaker herself.

Takesue's short film, about a traveler's experiences in Vietnam, was a selection at this year's Standance Film Festival. It was directed, filmed, produced and edited by Takesue during a three-month trip to Asia.

The documentary defies traditional narrative style and has no English dialogue or subtitles. Takesue shot the film simply by observing Vietnamese cities and landscapes and recording the reactions that the local residents had to her.

Some seem oblivious of the presence of Takesue's camera, while others stare intently at it. Combined with the shots of human interaction are nearly motionless scenes of the Vietnamese terrain.

"The piece, for me, is about the fluctuations that happen as you gain more intimacy with people," Takesue said, in a discussion held at the film's conclusion. "I was trying to play with the rhythms by starting off voyeuristically, and then slowly become more personal."

During the discussion, Takesue explained that she had no intention of shooting a film when she decided to travel to Asia. She had finished her first documentary, Bound, and was preparing to take time off.

"I really made it in the process of recovery," she said. "I was so mentally and physically drained... I had lost perspective on the world around me."

She explained that she brought a camera with her only as a "diaristic tool," but eventually decided to try to make a film after being struck by her experiences.

"I decided," Takesue said, "that I would [create] a piece about regaining sight, about being able to appreciate the world around me."

"She's allowed the Vietnamese culture to come to her." Comparative Literature Professor Edwin Gentzler said, when introducing Takesue. There at UMass, in one of the courses that I teach, we tend to show films by filmmakers who want to explain, who want to indoctrinate you. When you see their films, you learn more about them than about Vietnam.

"But," he continued, "she wasn't going there with a vision of how she wants the viewer to see Vietnam. I wish more filmmakers had gone there with such an open mind."

At the conclusion of the screening, the floor was opened to questions and comments from the audience. One attendee asked Takesue how she elicited the camera subjects' reactions.

"I didn't do anything, really," she responded. "As I said, I didn't really have an agenda. I would be in a particular place for a while with my camera, just observing. Often people would come up and sit beside me. There were no instructions. I was looking at them, and they were looking at me."

Navy Seal killed in battle Rumsfeld offers sympathies

By Ken Campbell

A special operations soldier was killed in Afghanistan on Wednesday.

Chief Petty Officer Matthew J. Bourgeois, a Navy SEAL, was killed after stepping on a landmine during a training exercise near Kandahar. Another special operations soldier was wounded.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld expressed his condolences to the chief's family during a Pentagon press briefing on Thursday.

"This is, we are reminded almost weekly, a dangerous effort, and I am certainly enormously grateful to him for his service and to all of the men and women in uniform who voluntarily put their lives at risk for our country," Rumsfeld said.

The secretary also commented on relief efforts in northeastern Afghanistan, the site of Tuesday's earthquake that killed thousands.

"As part of the relief effort, U.S. military helicopters are delivering medical and various other supplies to the needy folks in the Hindu Kush Mountains," Rumsfeld said.

Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff described the U.S. relief efforts.

"We are working very closely with the Afghan interim authority, the administration and non-governmental organizations, overseeing the earthquake relief efforts in Afghanistan. In addition to the medical supplies that we sent yesterday, we are preparing to send nearly two dozen pallets of rice, blankets, wheat and cold weather gear to the people suffering from this disaster," Myers said. "Just bear in mind that at the same time we are doing that, we are also continuing our hunt for the al Qaeda and the Taliban that are left inside Afghanistan."

Rumsfeld also responded to criticism over the military tribunals, which are supposed to try al Qaeda and Taliban fighters currently being held at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The United States has every right to hold detainees, Rumsfeld said.

"As has been the case in previous wars, the country that takes prisoners generally decides that they would prefer them not to go back to the battlefield. They detain those enemy combatants for the duration of the conflict. They do so for the very simple reason, which I would have thought is obvious – namely to keep them from going right back and, in this case, killing more Americans and conducting more terrorist acts," Rumsfeld said. "Any combatants who have the good fortune of being captured instead of killed during an armed conflict are normally not in a position to

Security to go to local law

By Danielle Graves
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

(U-WIRE) NORMAL, Ill. – President Bush ordered National Guard troops to be placed in airports around the country as temporary security support in the wake of Sept. 11.

Now local law enforcement officers are replacing guards, a process that will be completed June 1.

"When the national guard was first put in those positions, we knew the last day of deployment was March 28, but Bush signed an extension enabling some to stay on until June 1," said Elizabeth Isham Cory, Federal Aviation Administration spokeswoman.

Monique Bond, spokeswoman for O'Hare and Midway airports in Chicago, said, "The basic mission of the airports here and around the country was to provide a visible presence in security...particularly at the screening check point."

She said the National Guard would be replaced by local law enforcement first, but eventually the local forces would be federal law enforcement officers.

The Central Illinois Regional Airport has national guardsmen to help in the efforts to provide sufficient security for air travelers, said Ricqui Clem, marketing assistant for CIRA.

Richard Bogartz in support of the Committee's recommendations.

The third recommendation made is for student support programs, such as Learning Disability Support Services, to encourage their students who are enrolled in Basic Writing 111 to allow their case managers to discuss strategies to help the students writing with the Basic Writing Staff.

The Writing Program has already acted upon the fourth recommendation made by the Committee and now supported by the Faculty Senate. It asks that Writing Program instructors by more explicit with students in offering the grading system used and its rationale and that students be provided with more opportunities to do expository writing, which is what is demanded of them in most of their other courses.

To support its program and help students, the Writing Program published and adopted a new course reader, The Original Text-Wrestling Book. The profits from the book, about ten to twelve thousand in this its first year, have, according to Curtis, helped the program survive the brunt of the University's cut backs.

The Writing Program's annual report was well received by the Faculty Senate, who unanimously decided to support the recommendations made by the Committee.

challenge their continued detention. To release enemy captives so that they could return to the battlefield would put the lives of more young American servicemen at risk and, in my view, would be mindless."

Rumsfeld explained that the mission in Afghanistan was being hampered by the fact that the coalition supporting the interim Afghan government has made no provision for a military.

"Our goals, which the coalition forces of course share, are to sustain an environment that will allow us to continue our work while we hunt down the al Qaeda and Taliban that still remain in Afghanistan or in the neighboring countries," Rumsfeld said. "To assist the interim government in establishing reasonable order in that country; to ensure that the conditions exist which will allow humanitarian assistance to reach the needy, and so that refugees can return from outside the country, or the internally displaced persons from inside the country to their homes.

"There is no question but that very little is possible in a country if there is not reasonable security. And therefore, it is regrettable that the donors conference that met came up with some money, but they came up with money for things other than security," Rumsfeld added. "And there's not a nickel in the donors conference funds that is available to provide for the development, training, sustainment of an Afghan national army. Nor is there money there for the International Security Assistance Force."

The United States is taking up the slack, Rumsfeld said.

"So the United States is addressing the question of raising some of our own money, and then helping to raise some money from other countries, so that whatever is decided can in fact be accomplished. And we have been busy doing that," Rumsfeld said. "Meanwhile, while this is going on, this discussion, I should say that the United States is currently working with the interim Afghan government to train at least the beginning of an Afghan national army and border patrol. And, in addition, the existing International Security Assistance Force is already helping to train some Afghan troops."

DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL/OPINION

COLLEGIANEDITORIAL@YAHOO.COM ED/OP EDITOR: MATTHEW DESPRES

Oscar worthy?

Not race, just talent

The Oscar wins of Halle Berry and Denzel Washington at the 74th Academy Awards have been widely celebrated in the recent week and rightly so. Never before has an African-American woman won a Best Actress award, and no African-American man had won a Best Actor award since 1963. The attention drawn by the dual wins will hopefully allow for more opportunities for actors of color in Hollywood.

Less than a week after the ceremonies, however, grumbling has begun that neither actor truly "deserved" the awards. Many have suggested that race played an inappropriate role at the Oscars this year, and that the two black winners were given their awards for reasons other than the quality of their performances.

These allegations are ridiculous. It is true that there was a huge amount of publicity surrounding the three major-category nominees this year [Will Smith was the third], and much attention was given to the fact that only one black actor had ever won for a leading category. It is possible that many Academy voters were worried about the negative attention that an all-white winner's list would receive. But suggestions that Washington and Berry won only because of their race deny some basic truths.

First, both winners gave universally admired performances. While the quality of a performance is, of course, subjective, there is no getting around the fact that Washington and Berry had more critical support than many recent Oscar recipients whose wins were less controversial. Denzel Washington won the Best Actor award from the Los Angeles Film Critics Circle [one of the most respected critics' groups in the country] in the months before the Oscars, while Berry won Best Actress from the National Board of Review. Last year, Russell Crowe won the Academy Award for Best Actor without receiving a single major critics' award [just as Kevin Spacey had the year before], without any grumbling that he won the award for "the wrong reasons."

Furthermore, it should be common knowledge to anyone who has ever watched the Oscars that the distribution of the awards rarely has anything to do with merit. Young, beautiful actresses regularly win out over seasoned veterans, and it's obvious to the audience that it has little to do with the quality of their performances. Old actors are often given Oscars for mediocre performances, as a way of honoring their entire body of work. The awards are sometimes given out of sympathy, as they were in 1960, when Elizabeth Taylor won Best Actress for the film Butterfield 8, when a rumor spread that she was dying. To act as though something is horribly wrong when Oscars are given for anything other than pure respect for talent is to deny the nature of the event.

Even if one personally didn't like the performances of Denzel Washington and Halle Berry, or admired them but would have preferred to see Russell Crowe and Sissy Spacek in the winner's circle, it is absurd to imply that this year's Oscar recipients owe their success only to their race. Audiences nationwide greatly appreciated both actors' performances, and would have appreciated them regardless of the colors of their skin. If the Academy was biased in favor of blacks, then why has it taken this long for two black actors to win in the same year?

Where art thou spring?

SEAN JAQUET

I'd like to depart from my nonnal writing style this week in order to focus on something more upbeat. Normally, I rant about whatever is on my mind. My previous columns have even earned me the label of "lunatic" from this very publication. To show that I'm not as depressing as my writing indicates, I'd like to discuss something that can make even the most somber of people smile: spring.

As I write this, a cold rain is falling, and I'm listening to "Riders on the Storm" by the Doors. I yearn for the days when its 70 degrees and sunny, and I'm listening to Bob Marley (am song will do).

Yes, spring is the best of all seasons. A time when we emerge from the cold, harsh New England winter into a new season. Spring coincides with new beginnings, a fresh start. The weather turns warmer, and more pleasant. We can shed those winter coats and sweaters in favor of T-shirts, shorts and sandals. The days grow longer, and the temptation to blow off Spanish increases exponentially. Motivation decreases as well, but you're having too much fun to care.

Soon, hundreds of kids will occupy the steps of the Campus Center, the Student Union and the quad by the pond. Frisbees, footballs and baseballs will fill the air, as the ground will no longer be a soggy mess. No longer will we have to wade through puddles of freezing rain, slush or black ice. We won't have to scrape the ice off cars and turn the heat on full blast. (If you own a 13-year-old Oldsmobile, you won't become so frustrated when the thing doesn't turn over that you break off the knob that rolls down the window. So then every time you go to the ATM or Burger King, you have to open the door and get out of the car instead of just reaching through the window. Or maybe you got pulled over by Sunderland's finest going 32 in a 35. You have to open the stupid door because the window doesn't roll down, and then Starsky gives you a $145 ticket while his partner Hutch looks to see if you have any guns or drugs tucked into a laundry basket. "Listen fatty," I'd say, "I pay your salary. Why are you trying to nare out my stash? You can cram it with walnuts, ugly. Screw you and everybody that looks like you. Dammit!")

Wait. What was I talking about? Oh yeah. Screw Flanders. No, no sorry, I guess I could fit a rant in this column.

Once spring has come, you can finally save money on your heating bill without having to wear four layers around your poorly insulated apartment. Gone will be the days when the puddle water soaks through the bottom of your pants. You won't have to do laundry every week to wash out those salt rings that have crystallized on the back of your pants.

Spring also has health benefits as well. The warmer weather will take care of that head cold and runny nose, thus negating the need to blow your nose every five minutes. The climate also encourages activity and exercise. More people will begin to jog, play soccer, baseball or whatever else. If the recent patches of warmth are any indication, the Horseshoe in Southwest will soon be littered with kids asking, "Who's got next?" Kids will be itching to get out in the open after being cooped up indoors for five months. I myself am just about going stir crazy.

Perhaps the most satisfying change of spring is that in my mood. I'm a much happier, easygoing guy when the weather is pleasant. For whatever reason, spring makes me feel satisfied and glad to be alive. I'm much more appreciative of nature in the spring. The grass returns to its lush green color. The leaves adorn trees once more. The sun shines with more frequency. Perhaps it's because spring leaves the dreariness of winter behind, but spring presents a much different vibe than any other season. People seem friendlier and more polite.

Spring is also noted as the time when "a young man's fancy turns to love." I don't know if spring necessarily heightens my interest in the opposite sex, but I will get caught taking a second look at some of the halter top-clad ladies walking across campus. As the temperatures rise, the girls wear less and less, and sometimes I can't help but look. (As chauvinistic and typical-male as that may sound, I'm only human and not nearly as evolved as I'd like to think.)

We will also be able to party outdoors. Warmer weather allows us to spill outside of the house onto the lawn. You won't have to turn sideways to knife your way through a crowded party anymore. You'll have space to turn around without bumping into four or five people and committing the most grievous of party fouls: spilling beer. You won't have to wear a coat when going outside on a Saturday night only to be stuck holding the goddamn thing all night, because it's too hot to wear it indoors, and you don't want it to get stolen.

Now for my favorite part of spring: baseball. Every spring, the Red Sox begin play. Fans hold on to the unwavering hope that this, indeed, will be the year. How does Pedro look? Are Nomar and Varitek OK? Is Manny finally comfortable with the Sox? No matter how dismal the forecast may be for our beloved Sox, we'll stick by them through thick and thin, as we've always done. Fresh off the heels of the Patriots magical Super Bowl win, there is a renewed sense of optimism surrounding the local nine. With new management, a new attitude and a slew of new players, there's reason to be excited.

This spring will be my first at UMass after two years at the perpetually boring St. Anselm College. (If there's any place cooler than Manchester, New Hampshire, I haven't found it.) The rain continues to fall outside, and I'm now listening to System of a Down's "Aerials." (Yes, they actually have other cool songs besides "Chop Suey.") I conclude this column wishing now more than ever that spring would come. Hurry up, spring. I need you. My car needs you (and a new window knob). We all need you.

Stupid ideas and…stupid ideas

YOUSEF MUNAYYER

Recent events in American foreign policy have grown to amos me. Over the past few weeks, the situation in the Middle East has been getting significantly worse. The "spiral of violence" was spinning out of control, as many cable news networks euphemize, to appease a somewhat uninterested population. Since the violence was getting worse, and negotiations have not occurred, any steps taken by the United States in the conflict are magnified.

Whoever had the bright idea to send Dick Cheney on a tour in the Middle East to try to gain support for a war against Iraq must really believe that everyone watching is as gullible as the public to which they are trying to sell this war. Of course Dick Cheney met with several leaders of Arab nations in the Middle East and was told that Iraq wasn't on their agenda and that they would not even consider the issue before more was done to settle the violence in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in only the way the United States can.

So what's the deal with Saddam anyway? Why is he so dangerous? Well, if you are listening to the war auctions on the TV news programs, they will tell you that the reason Iraq is a big problem is because Saddam is developing weapons that he has used and may use again against the people of Kurdish ethnicity in the northern part of "his" country. This is a terrible thing if it is true. Who could possibly tolerate a regime that is committing mass acts of genocide? Any country that does this should be bombed to smithereens and started over with a new government that practices "strategery," as President Bush would so eloquently say.

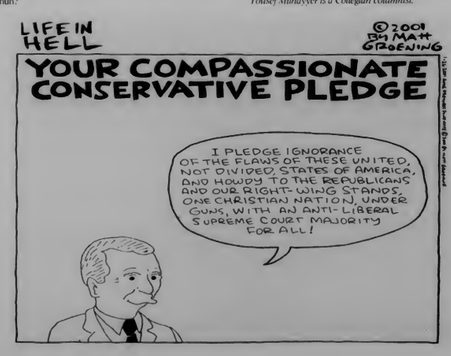
So here is the question: If The United States was so terribly worried about the poor Kurds in Iraq and worried that Saddam would be crazy enough to use means of force against American interests, why then would it ignore the same threat from Turkey? The Turkish government has been accused of atrocities against the Kurds in their own country as well. In fact, the number of dead has been estimated to reach 2 million Kurds in the past 20 years. Insanity? Yes. Immoral? Yes. Supported by U.S. arms and technology up until 1998? You bet.

So why, is it that the United States would condemn Iraq for these terrible atrocities but not make a big deal over the Turks? Maybe its because Turkey is a "democracy." That makes it ok, right? Or maybe it's because Turkey is a member of NATO. That would justify it, right? Or maybe, just maybe, it's because Turkey doesn't have the oil reserves that Iraq does? Now there is a possibility. Who would have thought that the United States would wage war on a nation because of oil interests? Radical stuff, huh?

My only request is that if these foreign policy makers want to sell a war to the public, tell us it's because gas will be 12 cents cheaper. You never know, maybe public support for the war will rise.

Another idea that I was hearing about on the news last week was about the genius to whom the thought was revealed, apparently by some divine force, of putting U.S. troops between the Israelis and the Palestinians as a "peace keeping" force. Wow. I was amazed. This is the worst possible thing that could be done by the policy makers in this country.

The Palestinians would look at it as superficial. Not because of American support of Israel, but because of the fact that if the United States was interested in a peace keeping force in the region to safeguard the inhabitants, they would not have shot down the Palestinian cries for an international peace keeping force via the United Nations.



So when it comes to the stupid ideas that have been floating atop the scum-covered American Foreign Policy pool towards the Middle East, I can only think of one word: hypocrisy.

Changing subjects, as some may have expected by the duality of the columns title, and rather abruptly, I am very close to tearing down each and every one of these ridiculous campaign signs that clutter the campus. Everywhere I look, I see one, two, three… 19 of them. Yes, 19. I kid you not. One of the bulletin boards I saw had 19 identical campaign flyers juxtaposed forming a meaningdessness collage. Can you imagine how many perfectly good pool cues could have been made out of all that paper? Or even the little white boxes used for Chinese food delivers? Personally, I think that would have served a better purpose.

Thinking about this logically, the campaign lead by the candidates seemed to have one goal: get your name in as many places as you possibly can, including inside urinals. What does this say about the voting population? To me, it says that the candidates think the voters at UMass will only vote for them if they can remember the names of those running as they enter a dinning hall while trying to avoid several people handing out yet more flyers and asking you to vote for their candidate. Are these the kind of people we want running the SGA? Well, then again, it is the SGA.

I even overheard one candidate introducing himself as a "hard-working guy." Well damn. I'm sold on that alone. One of these guys even tried buying people cookies to get votes. Clowns I tell you. Clowns who run the circus they like to call the Student Government Association. I'm glad these elections are over.

JOHNNY DONALDSON

I was stuck home during Spring Break, and since I was born and raised in Northampton, I didn't even get the luxury of traveling back to my old hometown again. (When you still live at home there's nothing to resist.) While I spent the majority of my daytime hours sitting in front of the TV, I began pondering about writing my own college piece. I let my voice be heard and stretch a bit beyond merely writing reviews (which I love doing; I have no desire to move into world of film page journalism).

I decided to go easy on myself and planned on writing a random thoughts-piece that others before me have tackled. It was mostly trivial, minor stuff, like the horrified thought that popped into my head earlier in the week centering around my job as a film critic. Mainly, would it come back to bite me in the ass when I become an actor in Hollywood, especially with my reviews archived on the Internet? But a couple related thoughts began percolating in my head, pushing out all other ideas and refusing to let new ones take hold. My random thoughts column was taken over by one big thought.

The seed for my rant was planted early one morning, when I was channel surfing at around 5 a.m. (don't ask). On the TV came an ad for that best-selling video series Girls Gone Wild. I stared at the TV and shook my head in forlorn sadness at the swill before my eyes and made a mental check to touch on that topic in my little writing. But that little seed began to ferment and got all the water it needed on Sunday afternoon, when listening to the radio in the car, I tuned into 92.1 FM, one of about a dozen stations I listen to, and up came add for something called "Boxing For Boobies." Two of the station's personalities are sponsoring an event, taking place on April 2, in which women with A cups will box in a competition to win a free breast enlargement.

My head began to ache, my stomach somersaulted and my faith in humanity shrunk just a little more. For all the advancements that women have made to prove equality – they are equal with men in all respects, save for physiology, in my eyes – we still get horrid, exploitative trash like these two piles of dog crap. The worst part? That the women could so willingly object themselves to this kind of treatment.

For those who don't know the Girls Gone Wild videos are amateur adult videos that show ordinary girls getting drunk and then being induced into flashing their wares for a fetch with a camera. The proprietor of this sleaze, who's name I don't remember and don't want to remember, has gotten rich selling this sorry piece of dung to sad men who can't get a girlfriend. (Hey, I can't get a girlfriend either, but I'm not spending my days watching women being exploited either.)

But it's not the guys that have me worried; it's also the girls. What they do is, frankly, disgusting. There's no need to flash your breasts just because a camera is around. Now, I'm not a prude, and I like seeing attractive members of the opposite sex nude as many people do. That's human nature – we're all hard-wired to feel those feelings. But I least I think it should be seen in an artistic context (as in a movie or tastefully done photograph), or an intimate context, with two people who love each other. But simply showing your breasts is dirty and whorish. Don't these girls realize that this can come back to haunt, especially if they seek prestigious careers?

Memo to girls: not all guys like it if you just rip your shirt off and try to make out with them. A lot of guys may not respect you, and you may even turn off guys who don't believe in sex on the first date (such as myself). But in all due respect, these girls were probably drunk and were coerced into doing this by a lonely guy with no social skills who needs to tape hammered women removing their tops just for any sexual contact. These videos are like porn films. Hustler and Pamela Anderson Lee – completely disgusting.

But the "Boxing For Boobies" contest is even more disgusting. Listening to the promo on the radio, they replayed a conversation one of the loser morning men had with a young woman. When she said she had A cup sized breasts, he said that was terrible. Why or how is that terrible? She's not unattractive because her breasts are small. What makes a girl attractive is her personality, humanity, intelligence, sense of humor, and – if you must be shallow – her face, not her body. In fact smaller-sized A, B, C cups can be more attractive to some guys than big D cups. By perpetuating this kind of sleazy contest, we are teaching little girls to have low self-esteem because their breasts aren't D level. This is terrible.

I also have problems with cosmetic surgery, namely breast augmentation. I can't, and I won't date girls who had their breasts worked on. You have small breasts. Embrace. The confidence to live with how you look is sexier than changing yourself to look like what jackasses want you to look like.

We need, as a nation, to rise up against such sad, sad, sad displays of men exploiting women for sexual follies and women willing to be their little dollies.

Celebrities Suck

Last Sunday marked the 74th Annual Academy Awards, a night to honor the very best in film and also to continue with the tradition of the single most annoying aspect of popular culture: celebrity worship. From the glorified red carpet arrivals to the contrived acceptance speeches, the Oscars once again proved that these awards shows are nothing more than a collection of egomaniacs packed under the same roof. Yet these egomaniacs are admired and even worshipped by millions.

What are they wearing? Who are they with? What will they say in their acceptance speeches? How about another question: why do people care?

Case in point: Whoopie Goldberg was the show's host. On what basis is this woman funny? Is she any more talented or humorous than the countless stand up comedians making the rounds on the nation's comedy club circuit? Of course not. Yet for some reason, she's a millionaire and host of the Oscars. People seem to actually care about what she says and does, or as Joan Rivers puts it, "who she is wearing."

Whether it's listening to Halle Berry pretend to be some amazing actress or listening to some relic from the stone age, like film director Arthur Hiller, tell us how great a person he is while receiving the obligatory lifetime achievement award (thanks Arthur for letting me know that you "do the things that everybody should do." Now who the heck are you anyway?), it is nauseating to listen to these celebrities toot their own horn. The only time there was an injection of life into this year's otherwise "cure for insomnia" show was when that circus act flew around, which shows what a bore this collection of celebrities was.

This might sound like a rant, but it doesn't matter. These people and things deserve to be ranted against. Guess what Will Smith; not everybody likes you. Why don't you do a movie that isn't "high concept" for once and then see how many fans you have? Ben Affleck: go spend some more money on rehab! And for gods sake, why must the world be preached to about how great "Lord Of The Rings" is every five minutes? Oh and while we're at it, to the cast of "Friends," you don't deserve a million dollars per episode to read off lines that other people write for you!

Of course celebrity worship isn't only a once a year phenomena like the Oscars. Supermarket tabloids and shows like Entertainment Tonight keep the madness alive, but the newest perpetrator is MTV's "Cribs." The show, which is MTV's latest jaunt into the world of celebrity worship, shows off the house of not one, not two, but three filthy rich celebrities in every episode. One of the recent featured cribs was the shooting range that former New Jersey Nets star Jason Williams lives at. Nothing better sums up the over-the-top, self-absorbed nature of the show than watching Jason Williams show off his gun collection. What irony.

I know the argument, if someone gets rich, why not be proud of it? Why not show it off? Note to self: when I become filthy rich writing Tube Notes as a nationally syndicated column (then I'll wake up), don't flaunt my wealth on MTV's "Cribs." Call me a crazy hippie, but when MTV parades out 13 year-old rapper Lil' Romeo showing off his "crib" and Jaguar with gold planted rims that say "Richie Rich" on them, I find it a bit disgusting, especially considering there are 13 year-olds in this country who go to bed hungry at night. But then again, Lil Romeo has worked hard to earn every penny, and Whoopie Goldberg is an amazing talent. So why should I be upset?

Shepard's story lives on in Guild's Project

By Julie Burrell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In October of 1998, Matthew Shepard, a 21 year-old gay student, was found tied to a fence, brutally beaten and unconscious. Days later, he died. Presented this weekend by the UMass Theatre Guild, The Laramie Project was written in response to this hate crime.

The play, by Moises Kaufman and other members of the New York City-based Tectonic Theater Project, takes its name from the Wyoming town where Shepard lived. Troupe members traveled to Laramie about a month after his death, and for over a year, conducted hundreds of hours of interviews with townspeople, Matthew's friends, his family and friends of the two young men charged with his murder.

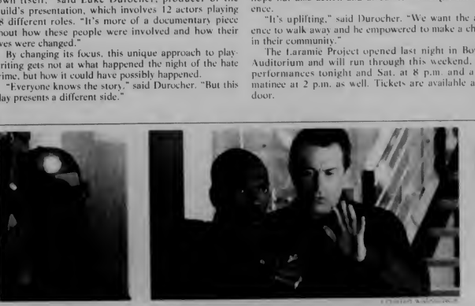
"It focuses not on the case, but how it changed the town itself," said Luke Durocher, producer of the Guild's presentation, which involves 12 actors playing 68 different roles. "It's more of a documentary piece about how these people were involved and how their lives were changed."

By changing its focus, this unique approach to play writing gets not at what happened the night of the hate crime, but how it could have possibly happened.

"Everyone knows the story," said Durocher. "But this play presents a different side."

The story is well known indeed and has been well publicized. After the news broke, the Shepard case came to the forefront of debate about hate crime legislation. Laramie itself became a place flooded by supporters of gay rights and also anti-gay groups. Americans were forced to reexamine their beliefs on homosexuality and the intolerant climate that led into this crime. The story will not soon be forgotten. for HBO has recently made the play into movie, also titled The Laramie Project, which premiered at the 2002 Sundance Film Festival.

By giving voice to the people of the town, the play allows the audience to see that Laramie isn't the exception. It's the rule.



"This could have happened anywhere," said Durocher. "Hate crimes happen everywhere."

Despite its subject, the play isn't meant to be sad. A goal of the Guild's production is to engender not only hope but also action and discussion amongst the audience.

"It's uplifting," said Durocher. "We want the audience to walk away and be empowered to make a change in their community."

The Laramie Project opened last night in Bowker Auditorium and will run through this weekend, with performances tonight and Sat. at 8 p.m. and a Sat. matinee at 2 p.m. as well. Tickets are available at the door.

Because he was gay, Matthew Shepard was brutally beaten and died as a result. The Laramie Project takes up this work, told by the people it has to say.

SHOWTIME
Starring Robert DeNiro and Eddie Murphy
Directed by Tom Dey

Was I expecting a brilliant script and performance when I went to see the new buddy cop flick Showtime? Hell no. Was I expecting to laugh at the 92 minutes of Robert DeNiro and Eddie Murphy? Yes. It's with these meager expectations that I saw Showtime.

Showtime is a satire on two things. On the surface, it parodies reality television. Mitch Preston (Robert DeNiro), a seasoned veteran of the Los Angeles police department, tries to bust drug runner and gun dealer Lazy Boy (Mos Def, a rapper) and literally runs into patrolman Trey Sellars (Eddie Murphy). Sellars, who's a member of L.A.'s finest by day, is an aspiring actor during his lunch breaks. During the ensuing chase, Preston is sidetracked by a cameraman, and shoots the camera, causing the national spotlight to focus on him. Seeing this real-life Dirty Harry, Chase Renzi (Rene Russo) sees him as the perfect star for a reality cop show. She forces him to be her star and puts out a casting call for a sidekick ("a funny minority type"). Trey answers the call by staging an audition arrest, and when Preston expresses his disapproval of his methods, Chase knows she has found her second man.

With the new team together, they go searching for the mastermind behind Lazy Boy and this new super-gun. As if you couldn't guess, the bad guy is a foreigner who infests the city of L.A. with yet another dangerous gun. But then again, no one said that this story would be genius.

Despite the lack of imagination of the story and continuity problems (three of these "super" guns take out an entire house in the projects of Southern L.A. but seem to have little or no kick back) it's not a bad movie.

What carries it is the comic performances by DeNiro and Murphy, playing off each other and the underlying theme of the script that shows how news stations and people love "action news," as well as showing just how fake television is. This is where the script shines: with the small "changes" that television makes for reality shows. For instance, the office for the detectives is too gloomy, so over night Russo and her production team "update it" including a glass desks and a confessional booth for both Trey and Preston. They also update Preston's apartment and car to make him more view-friendly, if very out of character.

To teach Mitch and Preston about being TV cops, the producers bring in T.J. Hooker himself, William Shatner (playing himself) to give them tips. He teaches them TV-cop tricks like the hood roll and busting through doors, showing DeNiro's disbelief that he's actually there. Eddie Murphy eats it up.

The movie also pokes fun at the buddy film genre itself. Throughout the film, DeNiro talks about how he hates these shows and movies. However, suddenly with expectation, he and Murphy eventually become good partners and friends and speed through the streets of L.A. and punch out criminals in a nightclub. The music of the film becomes overly dramatic too, but just over so slightly so that the realization that the film is mocking itself is almost subliminal to the audience.

Showtime isn't terrible, and it's not fantastic. It's somewhere in-between, more of just a fun movie. If you like the comedic DeNiro (showcased in Meet the Parents) and the over-the-top Eddie Murphy (viva Bowfinger), than you'll find Showtime to he enjoyable, entertaining and just an overall good flick.

Next step toward NCAA's

The Minutemen hope to bring ECAC conference rival Penn State to its knees this Saturday much like they did to previous foe Hartford.

By Eric Soderstrom and Matthew F. Sacco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team is four wins away from gaining a spot in the NCAA Tournament and swiping control of its destiny from the hands of the NCAA Men's Lacrosse Committee.

Thanks to its membership in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC), No. 11 UMass (6-1, 1-0 ECAC) can earn an automatic qualifier to the Tournament by securing the best record in the conference.

And the best way to do that, of course, is to win them all. Last year, the Minutemen went 5-1 in conference for a share of the title with Georgetown. But because of its 13-12 loss to the Hoyas, UMass lost the tiebreaker for the Tournament bid.

That's why going undefeated in this conference is so crucial.

The Minutemen won their first ECAC battle of the season at No. 17 Navy on Mar. 9, with a 13-10 victory over the Midshipmen in Annapolis, Md.

UMass' second conference battle commences Saturday when it travels to University Park, Pa. for a date with Penn State (3-3, 0-2 ECAC). Just the third all-time meeting between the two schools, the home team has won both previous meetings.

Last year in Amherst, the Minutemen beat the Nittany Lions, 10-9. In that game, Kevin Leveille had a goal and three assists while Don Little found the net twice. The year prior, Penn State won 11-8 at home.

This year's contest should be as close.

Penn State, just off a 9-8 loss to ECAC foe University of Maryland-Baltimore County last Saturday, has lost three straight tight games after opening the season with three consecutive victories over Notre Dame, Fairfield and Air Force.

Before the UMBC failure, the Nittany Lions dropped an 11-10 decision to No. 6 Georgetown and an 11-9 decision to No. 12 Cornell.

So despite its mediocre record, Penn State remains a force to be reckoned with.

Will Driscoll and his 19 goals lead a Lions attack that could flash an inverted formation at the Umass defense on Saturday? With that style, Driscoll - who scored a game-high four goals last year against the Minutemen - will fire a good number of his shots from the longer range. Joining Driscoll is Luke Ogelsby (three goals, 12 assists), Tim Emmick (seven goals, three assists), Sean Droogan (three goals, five assists) and Mike Jacober (seven goals).

Chris Garrity, who had 22 saves in his team's win two years ago over UMass, leads the Nittany Lion defense. He has started all six games this season and has 7.85 goals against average and a .609 save percentage. State's main faceoff guru is Rob Booth, who has taken most of the faceoffs this year, winning 57 of 67.

For UMass, the key will be solving Garrity and out toughing the Lions. In UMass' last loss to State, they were overmatched physically and in both recent contests, the Lion goaltenders were a thorn in the Minutemen's side.

The physical edge should go to the Minutemen this year. Their trio of down low defensemen are all physical specimens, and I'm sure Glenn Thiel's squad hasn't forgotten about the pair of near life dislocating hits Tom Fallon put on a pair of PSU midfielders last spring.

But Garrity has already proved once that he can dominate a game. Hopefully for the Minutemen, those memories will be long forgotten, and they can keep on the offensive tear they've enjoyed over the last few contests.

UMass has piled up 50 goals in its last three games, thanks in large part to a diversified scoring attack. Dan Paccione, Marc Morley and Kevin Leveille all have 20-plus points on the year while Chris Fiore, Gene Tundo and Jeff Zwicki have all crossed the 10-point barrier just half way into the season.

UMass has the talent to run away with this game. If they shoot the ball well and don't give Garritty any easy looks, than the Minutemen should enjoy their time in Pa.

Softball back at the Complex

Will host first home game after 28 away

By Andrew Merritt
[illegible]

There's no place like home.

Although if you ask the members of the Massachusetts softball team, they might tell you that there are plenty of places on the road that are almost as sweet. The Minutewomen are coming home, and they're bringing an 18-10 record (5-0 A-10) with them.

They are coming off of a successful week abroad, taking nine of twelve games, including a sweep of their first Atlantic 10 opponent, Temple.

Still, as well as they have been performing on the road, the women are happy to be home.

"We're so glad to be out here. To play your home opener, there's no better day in the season than the day of your home opener," said coach Elaine Sortino, who won her 750th game with the sweep of Temple.

The trio of games the Minutewomen played against the Lady Owls was the crown jewel of the week and opened up the Atlantic 10 season on a high note.

"I thought it was critical because of what it said to us. I thought they were very sound wins," said Sortino. "We played very heads-up softball in very ugly conditions."

Captain Jen Rooney said the sweep "was huge for our morale just to get the A-10 started and set the tone we wanted to set. We want to be strong like that, we want to make our presence known."

"I thought that they were very important wins for us, because Temple is a good team in our conference," Sortino continued. "It was a great road win, and I thought our intensity was good. I thought it gave us something to build upon for La Salle."

UMass will face the Explorers of La Salle this weekend with afternoon clashes on Saturday and Sunday. The Explorers bring an 8-15 record to the Softball Complex, but there's some recent history between the teams. The first game between the Minutemen and the Explorers last year was a 14-6 slugfest, won by the Minutewomen, who followed that performance with another offensive explosion, plating nine runs in the shutout. The wins were also career victories number 700 and 701 for Sortino.

"They've signed some pretty good kids, but I think our game will be competitive with them," said Sortino of the competition this weekend. "I think they'll be tough. Nobody comes to play us; they come after us, so most of our games are tough."

The Minutewomen, who have spent these late winter, early spring weeks practicing in Boyden gym and on Garber Field, will certainly have an extra bit of home field advantage going into the weekend.

"We get up for any conference game," Rooney said. "To be here in front of our friends and fans, just to be here, is so nice. Boyden was just getting old. It doesn't matter who we're playing; we'd be up for it right now."

While there have been plenty of highlights for UMass this season, the brightest has been the pitching, led by senior ace Jen Hadley, whose three victories last week earned her the nod for A-10 Player of the Week. In those three games, Hadley put up an impressive 0.67 Earned Run Average, letting up 17 hits and two earned runs, with 14 strikeouts.

Hadley has had some help though. Junior Kaila Holtz has had a solid year at the slab, with a 1.45 ERA in 77 innings of work, good for seven wins this season. Freshman Kelli Arnold has also stepped up, posting a 1.43 ERA in 29 1/3 innings, with 21 strikeouts.

On the offensive end of things, when the bats have been hot, they've been scorching, but that's been a more recent development.

"As far as our offensive game, I think our hitting is really coming around," said Sortino. "Our pitching's been solid since the first day we came out, but our hitting is really coming around."

The Minutewomen will have the chance to test that offense this weekend, with the boost from a home crowd.

"It's just fun to be [home]," Rooney said. "We feel like it's midseason now, and it's just good to be back here, with all the comforts of home really. It'll just be fun to have our fans here. You don't realize how great it is to be home. We've just been on the road for so long; it'll just be so great to be back here."

Chancellor on budget cuts: "We're fucked."

Cevallos agrees: "totally screwed."

By Woodward Bernstein
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At meetings yesterday, Chancellor Marcellette Williams learned of the University's financial fate for the coming year. Speaking frankly on the devastation of budget cuts, Williams said, "we're fucked."

"Honestly, I've been in some awful situations. I've traveled around the world, I've seen tremendous suffering, but holy fuckin' Moses," she said, "we're just completely fucked."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos agreed with Williams. "Honestly, we're just totally fucked."

The statements come after a meeting in which the University projected losses of more than $15 million in revenue, on top of this year's lost $15 million. The cuts will force the eliminations of more than 600 staff positions, and will contractually force early retirements on professors over the age of 27.

It is estimated that the University will only offer seven majors and twelve classes next year.

Paul Page, the University's Vice-Chancellor for Finance and Administration, was realistic about the situation.

"Even if we cut all of the non-essential programs we have here, and the essential ones. And the professors. And our building projects. And if we sold off our spare buildings. And we burned the library's books for heat instead of buying coal. And we fielded only our football team," he said, "we'd still be totally and completely fucked."

Student leaders reacted with the expected shock at the announcement.

"I knew we were really screwed," John Sheehan, the Student Government Association president said, "but holy shit."

His Trustee, Jon Laubinger, concurred. "This one time, I drank an entire case of Coors Light in like, four hours. Then my friends called to tell me they were doing body shots, so I had to do a few of those. I was so drunk, oh my god. But then we went uptown and I had a few Kamikazes. I was sure that was the most fucked I'd ever been," Laubinger said. "But not now."

Student leaders critiqued the University's "fuckedness" saying that it was "totally bogus and complete bullshit."

"What about diversity recruitment? What about this

In an attempt to unite the campus, Javier Cevallos (apparently dressing down for the day) and the rest of the University's administration has decided that the Yankees are to blame for our current fiscal condition. We couldn't agree more. They suck. Except if you're a New Yorker, then they rule. But still.

Cuts blamed on suckin' Yankees

By Nomar Garciaparra
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After months of repeated disappointment and discouraging budget cuts, the University of Massachusetts has finally announced the true cause of the school's deficit. In an emergency senior staff meeting in the Whitmore Bunker on Friday afternoon, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos declared that the New York Yankees baseball club is the root cause of the cuts.

"Well I think it's about time that we let the student and alumni populations what's really going on here. We've tried to keep it under wraps but that's just not possible anymore," Cevallos stated to a packed crowd in the Chancellor's Board Room. "Let's face it, it's all the fault of the Yankees. The Yankees really do suck."

He then proceeded to lead the group of administrators in the unofficial UMass fight song, the 'Yankees Suck' chant.

In a surprise appearance, UMass President William Bulger came forward from the back of the room to add to Cevallo's comments. After he calmed down the riotous chancellors, he went on to express his relief that the cuts are not related to his deviant brother.

"Hey, it's all the fuckin' Yankees' fault. I don't know who went around spreadin' the rumor that Whitey was usin' the school as a shell company to funnel drug money," Bulger slurred, holding up a 40 in a paper bag. "Shit, man. The FBI don't know shit. They'll never find Whitey. He's been launderlng money through this shithole for years. We ain't got no waterpolo because that fucker blew it all at Castaway's. Ah fuck it. Those Yankee fucks. Fuck them!"

According to Cevallos and other "important" administrators, if Babe Ruth had never been signed to the Yankees, the present budget cuts would not be an issue. Furthermore, in a statement signed by, among others, Chancellor Williams and Dean of Students Vanin, the "Curse of the Bambino" is behind the faculty cuts and the disintegration of University Child Care.

"Fuckin' Derek Jeter. Him and Bucky Dent are totally responsible for the loss of Consumer Studies. And Apparel Marketing was a great major. Britney Spears was gonna come here until that got the can," Vanin said. "I hate the Yankees. Mutherfuckers."

Frat boys bash homosexuals, then start acting totally gay

By Electric Funk Breakdown
FUNK BREAKDOWN

Brothers of Alpha Delta Lambda Fraternity reaffirmed their hatred of gays on Sunday, repeatedly referring to television exercise guru Richard Simmons as a "butt-pirate."

JARET BARROS/COLLEGIAN

As if this isn't clear evidence that truth is funnier than fiction.

The statements shocked university sex researchers, who for years have been observing the homoerotic nature of ADL initiation rituals.

"It's kind of sad that anybody in this day and age would bash gays," said Sociology Professor Deborah Clark. "But it seems especially hypocritical coming from frat brothers who strip their pledges naked at every available opportunity."

Clark is putting the finishing touches on a new book, titled, "UMass Frat Boys: Hating Gays, While Acting Gayer Than Gays Do" which she expects to be the landmark work in her ever-expanding field.

"Somehow, it never occurs to them that forcing a group of younger, submissive men to take off their clothes and play sexual games isn't exactly typical heterosexual behavior," she said. "Yet every semester, they bring out pieces of bread for the pledges to masturbate onto, and then eat. And then they talk about how they 'hate fags.' It really boggles the mind."

Among the initiation rituals that strike Clark as being excessively homoerotic: being paddled, being bound and gagged, being forced to dress as women, being photographed naked while in the company of clothed sorority girls, being anally penetrated with candles and other assorted objects, and, of course, the week-long period during which the pledges aren't allowed to associate with women.

"Supposedly, having to stay away from women has something to do with being sexually frustrated, and thus making the pledging experience more unpleasant," she said. "But I think we can all safely say what the real reason is for that 'tradition.' And I think sexual frustration has something to do with it, although maybe not quite in the way that they intend it to."

Clark's work is hardly the first on the subject of homophobic, homosexual fraternity brothers. Five years ago, a communications major, under the tutelage of Professor Sut Jhally, filmed a day in the life of Sigma Alpha Upsilon brothers as his senior thesis. The now critically-acclaimed documentary shows SAU brothers making AIDS jokes in between their own shirtless wrestling matches.

Despite all of the scientific attention being placed on them, UMass frat brothers remain oblivious to the homoerotic nature of their own existences.

"Man, that shit is unnatural," said ADL Treasurer Todd Wagner, while demanding that a pledge eat a grape out of his ass.

MassPIRG willing to anything including whoring themselves out

By H. Orne
A SAD LONELY MAN

Students at the University of Massachusetts recently were not-so-shocked to learn that MassPIRG (better known as those crazy tree-huggers) is really nothing more than a bunch of whores.

The story broke when freshman Clayton Seymour actually went to the MassPIRG office in the Student Union to actually pay his seven dollars. "I wasn't sure if they had gotten it from the checks I sent to the school. I just wanted to make sure I could do my part to help the earth."

According to the naive first year student, when he handed a male member of MassPIRG his seven dollars cash, the gentlemen said, "Are you sure you want to give this to me?"

Not thinking it made a difference who he would throw his money away to, Seymour responded, "I'll give it to anyone. I really don't care. As long as I can help."

"It's your money pal," reportedly answered the MassPIRGian as he started to disrobe. He got as far as his hemp underroos, before Seymour ran away.

"I didn't understand it. Why would he be taking off his clothes right after I gave him money," questioned the not-yet-jaded UMass student. "The only people I know who do that are prostitutes," he told the Collegian staff after his incident. Quite frankly, that's all we needed to hear.

Collegian staffers began calling anyone ever associated with MassPIRG, and after the longest ten minutes of our lives, we had a story.

Reeferman (he legally changed his name to this in the mid seventies), the first president of MassPIRG answered all of our questions. "Like, back in the sixties man, we needed a place to get from here to there. Since we spent all of our money on weed and LSD, we didn't have cars or even money for gas man," explained the stoned aging hippie. "So we started following the rules of the road. For a ride here or there we would perform certain sexual acts. But you got to understand it was the sixties, free love was everywhere. There was this one time on the way to Poughkeepsie, and there were like twenty of us and this truck driver wanted us to..." Collegian staffers quickly hung up before the stoner could finish his story.

Collegian reporters confronted current MassPIRG members with this new information and they quickly buckled, agreeing to admit

UMass plans bakesale, considers carwash

With it clear that the state will do little to bail out a financially wrecked University of Massachusetts, campus leaders have begun to plan for budget shortfalls.

Particularly, UMass will have a bakesale this weekend, and is strongly considering a carwash.

According to the University's Chancellor, Marcellete Williams, "we think that the bakesale might bring in a few hundred dollars, and heaven knows how many cars we might get washed."

Enlisting the help of many of the University's greatest cookie chefs, Williams said that she expects Jhally's Chocolate Chip Cookies will be huge sellers.

What's the communication professor's secret?

"Tollhouse. Yes, it's a corporation, but honestly — can you find a better chocolate chip cookie?" Sut Jhally asked, "Can you?"

Other possible big sellers include Javier Cevallos' self-described "world famous" brownies and Trustee Ion Laubinger's apple pies. Laubinger said he expects huge sales.

"If we can raise a few hundred dollars with this sale, we'll only be some fifteen million dollars short next year. This could be a great project," he said.

Not wanting to put all of the University's eggs in one basket, Williams said she was also considering a carwash — "who doesn't want to get their car washed, what with all the salt everywhere?" Williams wondered — but said that it wouldn't happen until it got warmer.

Rumors also had Williams cashing in the University's pyramid of beer cans, but for the time being, she was holding on to the structure valued at more than $58. She cited the pyramids built in memories.

New Chancellor Announced; Coleman Is In

In a surprise move over the holiday weekend UMass President William Bulger recommended former child star Gary Coleman for the position of chancellor. Equally as surprising was the emergency meeting held by the chancellor search committee to approve the recommendation. Coleman will take his post today.

Coleman is most recognized for his role as Arnold Jackson on the hit television series "Diff'rent Strokes." The show aired from 1978 thru 1986. More recently Coleman has made many cameo appearances in various movies, mostly playing himself.

Coleman's checkered past was a concern for some committee members. "I was concerned about his recent assault conviction," Mazamo Mangaliso, a committee member, said. Coleman was ordered to pay California bus driver Tracy Fields $1665 for hospital bills after punching her in the head. The case was presided over by Judge Mills Lane. She added that she felt, "he was the best candidate for the job."

UMass Student Trustee Ion Laubinger was ecstatic over the announcement. "He (Coleman) has worked with some of the best in the industry. Todd Bridges, that dude who played Mr. Druimmond, Coleman definitely has the qualities to lead this University into the future." Other students weren't so enthusiastic. Chad Benoit, a senior Marketing major who attended the emergency meeting had this to say, "I think he's a great fit for UMass. He fights for the little guy, you know? But I'm not too sure he's abreast of the budgetary issues. I asked him what his stance was, and he replied, 'Whatchu' talkin' bout, Whitey?'"

Two of the three finalists announced last week were unavailable for comment. John Lombardi was reached at his home in Florida.

"This is fucking ridiculous. I spent my whole life working in higher education and this little bastard beats me out. He's addicted to sleeping pills, you know? Good luck, UMass," commented Lombardi. The search committee played this off as a case of sour grapes.

Coleman will take office today. He is expected to address the university community later this week but no exact time has been set.

Somebody wins SGA Election

According to John Sheehan, the Student Government Association president, somebody definitely won last week's election.

"I'm pretty sure that it was one of the candidates too," Sheehan said. "But other than that I'm not even sure which one it was. I'm just sure that somebody won."

The barely publicized election — it is estimated that only three students even knew that a debate was going on — saw voters turning out in what might become record numbers last Wednesday and Thursday.

"I saw upwards of eleven people voting here alone," Linson Naval said. He is this year's election commissioner. "Some people even seemed to know who was running, which is a real change."

Unlike in past years, this year's election comes in the midst of a disasterous set of budget cuts.

"The winner guy certainly has a hell of a job in front of him," Sheehan said. "Or her. I'm not really sure."

Marcellette Williams, the University's Chancellor, embraced "the winner," saying that she looked forward to working with, "whoever it ended up being. We have a huge task in front of us, and having a student who fellow students can look to for leadership is a tremendous help in our fight against these cuts. Students have found a real leader in the winner."

Asked if she knew his name, she asked back, "that one with the hair, right?"

Sheehan concurred. "Two eyes also. Definitely hair and two eyes."

Marcum mocks eliminated teams, calls gymnastics "gay."

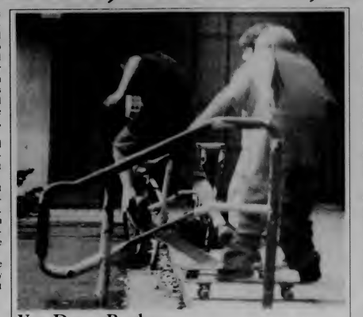
Athletic Director Bob Marcum, under fire for his decision to eliminate seven successful sports teams instead of a failure of a football team, fired back at his critics and those teams yesterday.

He described the seven teams eliminated as "totally lame, and some were bordering on being out-and-out gay."

"Does anybody want to watch a bunch of wussies swimming back and forth? Anybody? I guess it's kinda hard to throw a ball while swimming, but I've played volleyball in my pool and it never seemed so difficult."

Marcum has been heavily criticized for eliminating seven programs, most of whom had achieved athletic success in the past years. Marcum described women's volleyball as "lame-ity lame lame," and men's tennis as "just awful."

However, he saved most of his vitriol for the gymnastics teams. "Oh look at me, I can swing on rings, or jump over some things. Look at me. I feel over and rolled around. That isn't athletics — it's monkeys at a zoo. And frankly, I like the monkeys more because they sometimes scratch themselves and that's funny." He continued, wondering why, "men would ever want to jump around with one another? It's just so gay."



Marcum also made a point of describing this year's football team as the "best yet" and suggested that Mark Whipple's squad could easily stack up against Nebraska

Minuteman* newspaper endorses women's right to vote

Bolstering the women's movement considerably, the Minuteman has endorsed a women's right to vote.

In a staff editorial, the Minuteman agreed that, "in 2002, considering women's healthy contributions to our dinner and baby-having, we should reward them with the right to vote."

The Minuteman made sure to explain the sudden change in position – the University's conservative student newspaper has opposed a woman's right to speak unless spoken to until just five years ago — saying that it felt women had finally earned the privilege.

You Damn Punks

What in the hell is wrong with you? You conceived [illegible] every other day to tell us how much you hate Ken Campbell. Then after he, and you actually dropped your pants in protest of somebody else's belief and then you called him gay. How mature. Her your liberal parents who don't [illegible] spoil you to a middle point skating all over campus would love to hear that you're [illegible] in your pos tions.

So now I'll address you in your language.

Dudes, you are totally lameose. Honestly little [illegible] totally sux0r right now. So quit bein' so stupid and like, shutup and quit [illegible] your clothes and grindin' on your parents nickel. You're such [illegible]

Sincerely, Sam Wilkinson, Editor-in-Chief

Technically, McMillen's parents pay taxes, as he is still living off their weekly allowance of twenty bucks.

"Damn the Man!" McMillen screamed, looking around to see if anybody heard.

McMillen's grungy friends demanded similar skating freedoms. Wearing a Quiksilver t-shirt and a pair of Etnies skateshoes, Cindy Creedy protested a society that she wasn't a part of. "I'm not one of the corporate whores who plays football after school decked out in Adidas. I'm fighting the Man, and for that, I'm being repressed."

"The system totally blows the big one," James Candifarro said. Wearing retro shirts hinting at cartoons that he could not possibly remember because he had not been born yet, Candifarro said his revolution against the system would continue. "Dude, the mall totally sucks. Totally. Let's go grind over to Newbury Comics. We'll show the Man."

At Newbury, he purchased the latest Korn album. "They totally hate corporate America."

Local Catholic let down again

Another Easter, another letdown for one local Catholic. Joe O'Brien, who has come to expect the resurrection of Jesus Christ himself, was again miffed that the big guy didn't appear yesterday.

"What in the hell? Easter's the day he inakes his big comeback, right? I'm not wrong in thinking that this is the day he's supposed to make his return, am I? This is worse than Michael Jackson's recent return.. O'Brien said. "This sucks."

The Salem native has now been miffed for 21 straight years.

"I mean, good lord. Every year I sit through the buildup and the expectation, and every year, nothing. What's the deal? Is my priest lying to me or what?"

Father Jim Mulrooney expressed sadness for Mr. O'Brien.

"Hey, I swear to God I've tried to explain to him that we're just remembering the Resurrection, but he's forever expecting it. I think he was really let down this year. He was pretty convinced this was his year." Mulrooney said. "Especially after the Patriots and everything. Hell, I was ready for Jesus to come walking in after that game."

O'Brien expectation of a huge Resurrection has led friends to pity him. However, most describe him as a loyal Catholic who is just misinformed on this particular issue.

And Christmas.

"Everyday December 25th, he watches the news all day, and when Jesus Christ isn't born, he gets absolutely miffed. One year, a guy named Jesus was born, but its turns out it was actually Jesus, like the Spanish name. Boy was he a pain to be around for the next week." Billy Malley, a friend, said.

Despite the Savior's refusal to appear this year, O'Brien explained that next year was likely the year. He conceded that his expectation of a resurrection this year might have been unrealistic.

"What was I thinking? 2002 and the year the Patriots won the Super Bowl? It's not like God shows up twice in a given year. My bad."

Management major says UMass mismanaged

The University of Massachusetts is a "textbook" case of mismanagement according to Peter Gabriel, a senior Management student says.

"We uh, study this kind of thing in a couple of my classes, like a what not-to-to kind of thing," Gabriel said. "And like UMass fits like every one of the indicators."

Gabriel explained that UMass wasn't "optimizing efficiency" or "minimizing overhead while increasing profits" and that was "fucked up."

Gabriel reached this conclusion after his fourth kamikaze at the Monkey Bar. Other Isenberg School of Management majors in the bar agreed, cheering Gabriel on as he expounded on his theory and pounded a Heineiken.

"Pete's a smart guy," Chip Fischer, a senior Accounting major said.

"There was this one time right, when Pete as taking this stupid history class for his gen-ed and he was failing, so Pete had our dean threaten the professor into passing him. Stupid history guy actually thought he could fail an ISOM kid."

Women's Studies Loses Stapler to Budget Cuts, Protests Patriarchy

Reacting to the loss of a stapler to recent budget cuts, the Women's Studies Department called the reduction a typical act of a patriarchy interested only in women's oppression.

According to the Department's Director, "the loss of even our precious stapler is indicative of a Patriarchacal conspiracy to deprive the women of this campus of their education, and in a larger context keep women in the kitchen."

Professors at both Smith and Mt Holyoke Colleges agreed, calling the stapler the "first step on a long road toward women being nothing more than barefoot and pregnant."

Ann Ferguson, another professor in the Department, asked that students remember the stapler, in all of her attempts to fight against a system that forever oppressed her into a world of menial stapling.

"That stapler hosted a very well-received poetry slam at Food for Thought books, the only local bookstore that isn't a part of the vast male conspiracy to contain women and their voices." Ferguson said "Her poem about male-domination and the impact of the Vagina Monologues was particularly affecting."

Ferguson dabbed at her eyes, but insisted she wasn't crying, as crying is the emotional construction forced upon women by men attempting to present women as nothing more than emotional heaps.

A fund-raising concert has been planned, with the Department saying in a letter to the Women's Times that it would "never back down to men hell-bent on their destruction."

"We will replace this stapler, and we will do it ourselves. If the University will not provide, then we shall overcome," said the letter.

Bulger then burst out laughing, saying, "She said 'Britney Spears was gonna come'."

Before 1918 the University of Massachusetts had absolutely no financial problems whatsoever. However, from 1918 on, after the Red Sox won the World Series the last time, the school has been on a "downward spiral."

The last time the Red Sox made it to the World Series, in 1986, held promise for the struggling school, but after losing to the Mets, the monetary situation actually got worse.

"Yeah, so that year we beat the Yanks to the pennant, but we still lost to a New York team, so it's natural that we would blame the Yankees for that anyway," Paul Page, another senior staff member said. "We can blame the Yankees for just about everything: world famine, global warming, globalization, exportation of American capitalist values on innocent and underdeveloped cultures, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Spam, George W. Bush ... goddamn the Yankees suck!"

The meeting concluded with Cevallos passing out "Yankees Suck" bumper stickers and t-shirts.

"We spent the money that we were going to allot to the Comparative Lit department on these t-shirts," Cevallos said. "There's nothing left now. They're fucked. Yankees Suck!"

Administrators then ran out of the boardroom and proceeded to make their way toward the Southwest Residence Area with the intention of starting another riot. They chanted "Yankees Suck" on their way out.

However, they stopped themselves before they made it through the doors of Whitmore.

"Wait a second guys, I'm wearing my new Hushpuppies," Cevallos whined. "I don't want to get beer spilled on them or have them get burned."

Williams agreed with Cevallos's attitude toward fraternizing with actual students.

"Yeah those kids are dirty, let's just give out a press release and go over to the Monkey Bar for some cocktails," she said.

University's commitment to a cheap education?" Gabe Tavarez asked. He is the SGA's Secretary of Finance. "Doesn't this University care anymore?"

"No," answered Williams. "We're just completely out of money. I went to the Fleet machines in the Campus Center basement to check our balance and I don't think we could afford to do laundry. Man-oh-man are we in some awfully deep shit."

The Secretary of the Faculty Senate, Ernest May, expressed frustration at the cuts and his own forced retirement. "You know, I actually liked teaching."

"This University has abandoned everything that once made it great, instead focusing only on our financial bottom line. We're paying the ultimate price for that loyalty now. Because seriously," May said, "we're fucked."

Williams, drinking directly from the tap at the Spoke, agreed. "Completely fucked."

everything.

"Yeah in the sixties and seventies, it was just about sex for rides across the country, but when the eighties came, people just wanted to give us money instead," said one of the dirty whores. "We then realized that this seven dollar thing was the perfect way to get income to save the only planet we have, and also continue with our prostitution ring."

"We provide two things. 1) Support for the environment and 2) hot "save the dolphins" sex," said one dirty whore. And when asked why she decided to become a dirty MassPIRG whore? "Well, honestly, it was either that or being a sorrotitute, and even a dirty earthy crunchy whore like me won't lower myself to getting drunk and fucking a frat guy nightly."

"It's not like we're buying drugs from the kids in Central with this money. We buy that stuff with the cash our upper-middle class parents send us for books," explained one of the man-hos. "Most of our income comes from Orchard Hill freshmen. Especially those Commonwealth College kids. Those cats are freaks. It's with their money that we try and save the planet with."

"But on the plus side Orchard Hill kids have abnormally large cocks.. and most are virgins. They'll pay for anything."

When news reached former SGA President John Sheehan he was outraged. "This is outrageous. Under their rationality, I should be able to get UMass students to give me money so I can buy more weed. I'm going to put a stop to this," proclaimed Sheehan as he charged across the hall. When he emerged ten minutes later he was smoking a cigarette and looked ruffled.

When this news reached former UMass students, there was a lot of bitching and moaning. Said UMass graduate Ryan Benharris, "SHIT! If I had known about this, I WOULD have paid 28 dollars A MONTH."

EDOP@SHUTTHEHELLUPANDJUSTLEAVEUSALONE.COM "THEY CANNOT TAKE OUR JOB SECURITY AWAY FROM US." PRAVDA ED. OF EDITOR: CURT EVERLY

We raise the white flag:

Our praise for The Minuteman

Today, the first of April, of the year 2002, we at The Collegian humbly submit to the stronghold of our competition, The Minuteman.

Its reporting is staggering. The editorials they pen always flow like rivers of lucid prose and consistently flirt with brilliance. The graphics and photographs they steal from this publication and others never fail to look better in their own gilded pages than those from which they so liberally dip into. In the one issue they have published this year, they have outdone each of our daily attempts at bringing to this campus a topical, relevant and objective news source.

No matter how hard we try, there's simply no competition.

Take, for instance, an article that appeared in the Fall of 2001. Sportswriter Dan Weaver painstakingly detailed the events of a softball intramural championship team of which he was a member. The self-references were abundant, and the concise insights Weaver had into his own conscious were nothing short of stunning.

That was some good shit, and we can't hold a candle to it.

Despite containing no actual news stories or factual information, The Minuteman continues to outpace The Collegian in every respect. They have Ed Cutting, the world's oldest student of any academic denomination; we have a substantial editorial staff and countless submissions representing a diverse student body. They have "Jackass of the Month"; we have regular features concerning the academic state of our campus. They subsist on an SGA-funded diet that virtually demands biased "coverage"; we earn our keep by way of the ancient, plain 'ole silly practice of selling ads, wiping our hands clean of obligations to anyone. Our editorial editor is half-Canuck; they don't seem to have editors, in the traditional sense, but that's just part of the intrigue. An outward lack of competence has yet to slow the M-Train down.

Do you see any contest here? No way! They rock our world.

To further impress their intelligence and integrity on the campus community, The Minuteman bravely withheld its' overpowering, twice-monthly publication schedule in order to bring out the big guns on April 1. We salute that gutsy piece of decision making: by opening up the public sphere and allowing The Collegian to publish uncontested, they have proven our decision to publish daily with legitimate news content a gross misstep in the practice of good journalism. Sources? Objectivity? Relevant information?

Christ, no. We've had it so, so wrong for too long now.

In the past we've fought for our voice, fooling ourselves into thinking that what we were able to accomplish was a worthy pursuit. That particular delusion, however, has passed. The Minuteman is a shining beacon of journalistic integrity and excellence. As long as the staff over there continues to practice its' art at a consistently high level, we at The Collegian will gladly trail behind, a distant second, alone in the dark.

Unsigned editorials never represent the majority opinion, as there is really no Collegian editorial board.

THE VIEWS AND OPINIONS EXPRESSED ON THIS PAGE DO NOT REPRESENT THE VIEWS OF ANYONE.

Why I love being a liberal:

Some reasons you probably didn't think of

Whitest Student Ever

The other day I was attending a meeting of Students United for Communal Kohabitation, when I realized that there is a genuine dearth of articulate liberal thought on this campus. "What in the name of Atheistic Mankind?" I screamed, much to the delight of the assembled masses, only two of which could be distinguished as either men or women. "Do you have any idea how necessary it is to describe why we are who we are?" And so it is that I find myself writing this column, to spread the Liberal Gospel unto all of the unenlightened, barbaric, patriarchal, bourgeoisie, racist, sexist and homophobic students at the University of Massachusetts.

I am a liberal because it makes me feel good. When I say "feel good." I am not speaking in a merely sexual context. Indeed, ever since I had my genitalia amputated in a protest rally against the Bush Administration's policies against abortion rights, I have had absolutely no sexual sensations whatsoever. No, instead I feel good because I know that I am right and the right is wrong.

The right is wrong because right-wingers, such as the gun-toting lunatic Charlton Heston (who fathered twenty-six children out of wedlock with his black slave mistress) or the pompous provincial putz William F. Buckley, Jr. (who, in his Connecticut estate, regularly chases local Jews and Methodists through his hedge maze while wielding twin machete blades) simply feel no compassion for anyone. What do I mean? Well, put simply, compassion is made manifest by the amount of money that one is willing to spend on a given problem. For example, poor people are a problem. We can't solve this problem by giving these people clothes, or food, or even housing. No, we must solve this problem through the expenditure of massive amounts of money on the Federal Housing and Urban Development Office. Only by properly meeting the needs of our men in Washington will we ever have a chance of helping the homeless man down the street. And Conservatives, like the squalid rats which they are, oppose all such measures.

But (and I should note here that, like Sir Mix-A-Lot, I like big butts and I cannot lie), once might ask, what about education? Surely, children in despondent poverty deserve vouchers to attend private schools and lift themselves out of their terrible circumstances? My answer would be, and indeed is, a resonant "No!" After screaming this word, which seems to be my invariable response to anything, I would then, and indeed do, consider the question and try to come up with an answer. After thinking for an hour, I would, and indeed must, answer that children who are in poverty will only be lifted out of that poverty by the presence of a government job as an Ebonics instructor at a local disheveled school.

"...I feel good because I know that I am right and the right is wrong."

You see, my fellow hyphenated-Americans, Ebonics education is the wave of the future in public schools, private schools and Brown University. If we do not get on the Ebonics train (as opposed to the "A" Train) now, it will pass us by like a taxi passes by a black man in Harlem. And that would be, to put it bluntly (as advocates for the legalization of marijuana so often do), unforgivable.

So what, then, is my prescription for the future? We must make major imprints, dents, and Mars in the body of society. First, women must understand that not only is all sex tantamount to rape, but those men who are allowed to use their eyes without large gobs of masking tape covering the sockets are committing a basic violation of a woman's right to privacy by looking at her. Second, the poor of this nation must rise up and eat the scions of industry. Simply shutting down Enron is not enough! Indeed, we must urge any American who makes less than $20,000 a year to hunt down their local CEO and eat him. Business executives, roasted on a spit, make wonderful entrees and go quite well with mashed secretary. My girlfriend, Bruce, wrote a wonderful recipe in last year's Quadrasexual Cookbook Of The Queer Quintessence.

Men enrolled as Republicans must be forcibly implanted with a womb and plastic fetus to compel them into an understanding of how tough it is for a woman to deal with a wage gap [ABORTION JOKE CENSORED BY THE COLLEGIAN EDITORIAL BOARD, S. WILKINSON, ESQ., PRESIDING]. As for the conservative students and undecided voters, it is our duty as patriotic Liberals to find them, confine the men to [GYNECOLOGICAL JOKE CENSORED BY THE COLLEGIAN EDITORIAL BOARD, S. WILKINSON, ESQ., PRESIDING], and force them to confess to being hateful, racist, intolerant, bigoted, homophobic, sexist, capitalistic pigs. Any state short of a willful screaming of "I am a straight white man and therefore deserve to be bludgeoned with an Aztec cudgel" is insufficient. We must demand compliance with our dogma, for that is the only way to keep the Ku Klux Klan from gaining yet another foothold in Massachusetts, where they already control most of the voting districts outside of Amherst.

Those professors who still believe in moral absolutes must be confronted by Liberal wiccas and forcibly exorcised back into the lower plane of Hell. I advise all students interested in performing such exorcisms to carry at least four sacred herbs in their pockets and to wield an ankh in order to show their loathing of the Cross. As for clergy, nothing short of converting their churches, synagogues, and mosques into centers for Humanistic Organizations Readily Speaking Everywhere So Humans Immediately Triumph, the dominant creed of Liberals such as myself.

If we march passionately, but without any semblance of male or female walking habits, into the corridors of society, we cannot help but be met with success. There is no reason, aside from 49% of the American electorate, why Liberalism will fail.

William F. Smutley, Jr. loves being a liberal.

Misinterpreted smiley ends relationship

By McCrae
Collegian Aviation Expert

A misinterpretation of the infamous 'yelling' smiley from AOL Instant Messenger ended a 4-year relationship at the Brandywine Apartment complex this past week.

Senior philosophy major Elisa Ripano had been dating senior engineering major Adam Glass since freshman year when Glass streaked the Orchard Hill Bowl Dance with 'will you go out with me Elisa?' written on his chest in Papa John's marinara dipping sauce.

"That was so cute when he did that," Ripano said, remembering the golden days of their union. "Other guys had done the same thing with Papa John's Garlic Sauce, which was gross. Adam was so much cooler."

Soon after the couple began dating they began to use Instant Messenger to talk to one another even though they lived on the same floor in Grayson.

"It really helped our relationship a lot," Glass said. "I'm really nervous when talking to girls, but on IM, whatever I'm feeling has a corresponding yellow face that pretty much says it all."

Instant Messenger was also vital in plunging Elisa and Adam deep into the steamy realm of uninhibited erotic passion.

"Basically, I knew Elisa wanted to have sex with me when she started sending that 'kissy' face IM all the time, for no reason. You know, the one with the lipstick? I mean, it doesn't take a genius to figure out what that means."

"I was worried that Adam would think I was being too forward in sending the 'kissy' face," Ripano divulged. "My girlfriends all made sure that I was ready a million times before I hit the 'send' button. 'Is he the one? Is he the one?' Yes! Geez, I know what I'm doing here.

"So after about the third or fourth time I sent the 'kissy' face as a response to serious questions he was asking me, he just came over and we had sex for about 25 minutes."

Elisa and Adam's happiness was sustained throughout most of their time at UMass, until the fateful smiley was sent just last week.

"Seriously, dude, I always send her the yelling smiley as a joke," Glass said. "But this time she flipped out, and thought I was yelling at her even though I just thought it was cute."

Glass agreed to grant the Collegian exclusive access to a portion of their break-up IM discussion, which has been minimized on his computer for four days. It is as follows:

DaddyBigNose: (yelling smiley)

SauceMama442: Oh my god, Adam. That is SO like you! You're always trying to control me with these macho displays! I'm sick of it!

DaddyBigNose: Ha...baby, it's just a little smiley. So what are you up to 2nite?

SauceMama442: Nothing with you, jerk! As far as I'm concerned, we're through! Never IM me again!

DaddyBigNose: LOL. That's crazy stuff, sweetheart. Now, are you goin' to the bars...

SauceMama442: (smiley with mouth x-ed)

DaddyBigNose: C'mon Elisa! This can't be the end!

SauceMama442: (2 smilies with mouth x-ed and a yelling face)

DaddyBigNose: Sigh. (crying smiley)

Since the couple broke up, Glass has logged on an unconfirmed amount of hours talking to SmarterChild, while Ripano is currently pursuing a relationship with Trooper221.

Justin Lewis pulls off massive heel turn

By Harry Paratestes
Sutamania

AMHERST — To the surprise of the hundreds of Sut Jhally fans packed into Thompson 102, former Umass Communication Professor Justin Lewis made his return to the University after spending two years in England this past Monday night.

Midway through a Jhally lecture on the evils of the Pepsi Corporation, the lights abruptly shut off in the sold-out lecture hall. After a few moments of silence, the British national anthem blared through the speakers of Thompson Hall as Lewis emerged at the doorway. He then joined Jhally at the lecture podium and extended his hand to his old friend and co-worker.

Suddenly, Lewis grabbed Jhally and clotheslined him. The stunned crowd watched as Lewis took off his suit jacket revealing an "Isenberg School of Management" T-Shirt. He then proceeded to spray paint "SOM" on Jhally, as the crowd began to pelt the stage with debris and their torn up course packets.

Lewis then proceeded to grab the microphone and taunt Jhally. "I have seen the light. Get out of my face you crazy lefty; I am all about the SOM now. Whatcha gonna do when me and the SOM run wild on you?!"

A crazy hippie follower of Jhally then hit the stage and began pounding on Lewis. The Republican Club then abruptly stormed the stage and set the hippie's hair on fire. Just as it looked as though Jhally's hair would suffer the same fate, the Dean of the UMass COMM Department, Michael Morgan, burst on the scene swinging a steel chair at Lewis and the Republicans as a song from the grindcore band Anal Cunt loudly blared.

Lewis and the Republican Club fled the scene, but not before Jhally and Morgan issued a challenge to meet them in a tag team match at the first ever "UMass Mania" at the Mullins Center this May broadcast on UVC 19. Lewis accepted the challenge, but stated that he would team with The British Bulldog and Jerry Falwell in the match, so Jhally and Morgan would have to find a third partner. Early speculation was that Karl Marx would indeed be the mystery partner.

Other matches for "UMass Mania" include Physics Professor Jennie Traschen vs. a Vietnam Vet. The Minuteman's Pat DeCourcy vs. Gabe Tavarez in a boxing match, Steve Lappas vs. Brusier Flint, the Republican Club vs. The Woman's Studies Department and finally, the next Chancellor of UMass will be determined in a three-way cage match between William "Hulk" Hogan, Big Bad John Lombardi and Miss Elizabeth Capaldi.

Hey yo.

Orgazzum cums again, and again, again.....

Collegian Ricardos

It's amazing that after a year of non-stop touring, movie cameos and guest hosting of TRL the sexually charged rap duo of CMunny and DJ Suds actually made it into the studio to make an album.

What's more amazing is that they made an album in the midst of all the gratuitous sex they had in the sound booth. Nonetheless, Orgazzum is back with a force in their sophomore album, Nice Shoes, Wanna Fuck?

While their debut album, Is there a mirror in yo pocket cuz I sure can see myself in yo pants made waves on both the Top 40 and Porn Soundtrack charts, Nice Shoes takes it down a level to a more subtle sexual expression. But it's still wicked horny.

The leadoff track, "They ain't crabs, baby, they're love crustaceans," features veteran "Simpsons" character, The Sea Captain. "Arrr, uh uh arr, yer my matey," he swoons in the chorus as DJ Suds scratches his balls in the background. Meanwhile, CMunny masturbates for the first of many times on the album.

Every cut features someone new who is random and STD prone. For example, Mike Tyson makes an appearance on CMunny's track, "Girl" Tyson's verse starts off with, "I'll eatcho asshole alive/I'll spread it like cream cheese with chives/when I go to soccer practice, my mom drives/baby my cock is huge, I swear/I took so many steroids that I ain't got no hair/listen bitch, I'll freak you in your ear," and concludes with the prolific statement, "I'm so huge I ate Van Gogh's ear, bitch." And then CMunny masturbates.

DJ Suds takes the moral high road for a change when he experiments with controversial political issues in his slow jam, "Fuck consensual condom use." For the second time, DJ Suds and Tennessee native Tipper Gore get together to make love to the mic. And also on the buffet table. And then CMunny masturbates.

One track, "I'm cummin' to getcha, Clue," is improved and complimented by the incessant incoherent shouts by genius producer, DJ Clue. Listeners will be excited to hear his hollow hoots squelched by an enraged CMunny who ultimately stabs him in the eyeball with an iron dildo. This is the first time Orgazzum has experimented with live recording. It is also the first time they have released anything unedited. It is also the first time they've killed someone on an album. " I took a NEW SHIT," and "Desert Porn" is then yelled by CMunny, along with "Lick my sensitive nipples" in true DJ Clue style, as DJ Suds proceeds to do so. And then CMunny masturbates.

As a bonus track, the two have released a remix of their original smash single, "Ass." This time, DJ Tanner from Full House drops a thick bassline and the Neptune Sound over Prince's melody to "Get Off." And then CMunny masturbates.

Prince is a constant theme in the new album as well. On the first single off Nice Shoes, CMunny teams up with the purple master to do "Jahova's Witnesses? Yeah, I'd fuck them too." It is reported that both Munny and Prince wore assless pants in the recording booth. It is also reported that DJ Suds wore frontless pants while they were in there too. And then CMunny masturbates.

Speaking of Suds, in "Have you seen my shoulder vagina?" the beatboxing, vocal turntablist himself lays down the instrumental for special guest Kermit the frog. "Muppets need penetration too/Miss Piggy gets freaky when we screw/bend down and pick up that folder/while I ram my muppet dick in your shoulder/I like to masturbate to Aunt Jamima/Suds I want to lick your shoulder vagina" are methodically rapped by the aroused amphibian. And then CMunny masturbates.

By far the most promising track is their second single, "I speak the language orgasm, wanna help me translate?" in which CMunny has an orgasm while riding the washing machine in her apartment complex and DJ Suds counts his sperm to the beat. "One million and a uh, eighi hundred thousand to the uh...." And then CMunny masturbates.

Finally, after 104 tracks of pure sexual and comic ecstasy featuring such stars as Gary Busey, Michael Eisner, the entire cast of "The Producers," my cat Fluffy, Elroy Jetson, The Password, Ashante's mom and a resurrected Tupac Shakur, the album makes its grand finale with the smash hit, "Fuck Nelly" featuring Common and Black Thought from The Roots.

After smelling Orgazzum's new album, Rolling Stone called it, "Dino-licious." And then CMunny masturbates.

"I've got a 30-foot hard on for that new shit," proclaimed Carson Daly after fucking CMunny, "I especially like that cut with Snoop Dogg, you know, the one about, how he shouldn't have done that porno. And then you hear Suds splatter his man-juice all over the car window." And then CMunny masturbates.

That shit will make you blow your junk. Seriously, if you're asexual before you hear it, you'll be gay, bi, straight, transgender and transsexual after. Mutherfucker it's hot. I put it on when I'm in the shower and touch myself for a long time. My mom heard it one time. She got hot too, it was weird. I mean, I don't have an Oedipal complex or nothin', but the woman lit my pilot light. But seriously, look for their first video on MTV3.5, it's the Shiz-nitty. Word. DJ Clue sucks.

And then CMunny masturbates.

Freakiest fake story ever

– Nixon, recently raised from the dead, here posing for Botticelli's Venus. Soon to star in The Crucible.

by Hedder
Collegian Arts Editor

Rumored Nixon's body has been found for Gus Van Sant's remake of Arthur Miller's play. In this modernized version of the classic tale oversized fishing wing will suspend Nixon's body while master director Gus Van Sant controls the puppet strings. Nixon, who will be played by Abigail Williams looks stunning in costume.

Rumor has it that Nixon was hired to perform special services" in this film. Gus Van Sant had no comment but his publicist stated that, "Mr. Nixon solemnly swears never had sexual intercourse with Gus Van Sant." The rigor that has surround the project has absolutely horrified critics.

Critics have panned Van Sant for remaking this remake. I myself had this to say: "I love Arthur Miller's The Crucible. Attending this new version was as painfully as if I was watching a provincial stock company doing the best it could without the Broadway cast. I was reminded of the child prodigy that was summoned to perform for a famous pianist. The child climbed onto the piano stool and played something by Chopin with great speed and accuracy. The great musician then patted the child on the head and said, 'you can play the notes. Someday, you may be able to play the music.'"

The exhumed body of Gene Siskel had no comment but his publicist stated that, "Mr Siskel by no means agrees with the use of exhumed bodies for personal benefit. It is disgusting and an offense to the evolution of humanity and an offense to, God oh God, mmm, oh oh Gene you're so cold, mmm. I'll give you two thumbs up," once again proving that there is such a thing as bad press.

The insanity following this movie film has been building ever since the first scoop of Nixon's hallowed ground accidentally put out Kennedy's eternal flame. JFK's publicist stated that, "Mr Kennedy is probably rolling over in his grave." Disturbed at the image of Johnny spending his afterlife on his face, the Ted Kennedy and an unknown transvestite got trashed off a bottle of Jameson Whiskey and dug up former president John F. Kennedy. To their dismay John truly had rolled over in his grave, and his face had collapsed. In tears Ted Kennedy drove off the side of the Sycamore Bridge at 75 miles per hour with his John in his lap. JFK's body floated down stream and was eventually recovered by his publicist, Kenneth Turran, who was found downstream crying with a dress and high heels on. Ted Kennedy is still at large. JFK's publicist stated that "Former President Kennedy has had a rough night, he just wants everything to be put back in order, and the evil-doers punished." Even after death, John F. Kennedy still has the ability to lead this country, simply amazing.

Van Sant's The Crucible opens on May 29, which means it will be up against Friday the Thirteenth part 10, Jason X. The competition is tough, but this reporter has faith in the American Classic, and faith in the rotting corpse of Richard Nixon. If you have any information about Ted Kennedy or his whereabouts, contact your local authorities.

Game decides Jewish superiority

By Shalom Torah
Collegian Jew

In their annual clash for religious supremacy, the Holy Cross Crusaders and the newly formed Holy Jew Gefilte Fishes battled it out at the Hart Center in Worcester.

As could be expected, the Jews came through with the 101-52 victory, ending once and for all the stereotype that all Jews were bad athletes.

"Obviously we were going to beat a team called the Crusaders," star Gefilte Fish point guard Ari Cohen said. "I mean, as might as well name your school the Holy Muslim School of Jihad. It is the exact same thing."

Still, despite the demoralizing loss, Holy Cross President, the Reverend Richard C. MacFarland, promised that he would appeal the decision.

"It is clear to me that this alleged outcome is nothing more than a world-wide Jewish conspiracy," the Reverend said. "This is even more unbelievable than saying the Holocaust actually happened."

"This school was founded on the principle of Christianity being superior to all other religions," athletic director Reverend Michael Geoghan agreed. "That is why we named it the Crusaders. I consider that period in time (the Middle Ages) when we as a people went on rampages killing everyone that wasn't Christian, a real plus in the history of humankind.

"We have always beaten the Jews – just look at the Inquisition," he added with a snicker. "Those were the good old days."

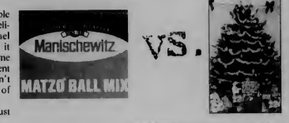
However, in the game itself, the Jews got out to the quick 27-3 lead behind six consecutive three-pointers from Cohen. At that point, though, a skirmish occurred when Holy Cross power forward John Paul III knocked the yarmulke off the head of Gefilte Fish center Bruce Levy.

Holy Jew, unlike other schools that use headbands for team unity, has been wearing matching yarmulkes since its last loss, a 67-65 setback on March 2 against the Buddhist Monks.

Since that time, though, the Jews have been riding a four-game win streak that included wins over the likes of such religious powerhouses as the Roman Pagans.

"The yarmulkes have really brought our team together," Gefilte Fish head coach Sam Jacobson said. "And it is convenient, too. On Passover we went from the court to the Temple without even having to go home first."

The skirmish between Paul III and Levy almost turned ugly when the Crusader tried to rip the head off of his Jewish compatriot. However, he was restrained by teammate Billy Graham, who thought that converting the Jews was a more logical answer than fighting them.



Still, Paul III remained enraged after the conflict. "When we read things like 'Thou shalt not kill' in the Bible, we are only referring to other Christians," he said. "The Catholic Church has killed more people than any other institution in the history of the world, but those savages and pagans all deserved it. We did those Indian and African bastards a favor."

In the second half, the Christians made a small run behind surprise starter Terrance Powderly, who closed the gap to 53-37 behind a pair of threes with 15:52 remaining. From that point on, though, the Jews used a 32-5 run to put the game away on the one day between Passover and Easter.

"We ate matzo ball soup and bagel and lox sandwiches before the game," Jacobson said. "I think that really got us motivated to play. It is impossible to play bad after eating lox – everyone likes that stuff."

Now, Holy Jew will travel to South America to take on the Incan Sun Gods in a game that could have many ramifications for the religious tournament in December.

"December is a great time of year," Jacobson said. "Chanukah, Christmas, Ramadan, Kwanzaa – everyone wants to be the best and part of being religious is thinking that your religion is the best. It should really be a competitive time of year."

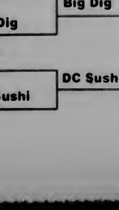
Boston College funeral set

A funeral honoring the death of the late Boston College will not be held. But a funeral mocking the death of B.C. is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon. The service will include a dunk tank where communist bastard and traitor to all that is good and UMass, Al Skinner, will be present for dunking. Other festivities will include a coffin shooting contest where Maroon and Gold coffins will be launched into the air and notable and loyal UMass alumni will have the difficult task of hitting the coffin with a guided missile. B.C. will then be cremated and their ashes scattered across Afghanistan.

Lacrosse players need counseling



UMass defensemen Matt McFarland and Tom Fallon have been ordered to receive anger management counseling after it was discovered that the pair gently urged Hofstra athletic director Harry Royal of a cliff. They had this to say.

"Dude we didn't touch him," Fallon said.

"Yeah," McFarland agreed. "We told him to die or we'll kill him and he just jumped. What were we supposed to do, stop him? It's a free country. What do you think, we have a biased committee on people jumping off cliffs."

Religious play-in game

The Holy Cross Crusaders and the Holy Jew Gefilte Fishes will play a basketball game for the right to play the defending Religious Bowl Champion Holy Islam El Hoopsters. The El Hoopsters won last year's title game on a controversial non-call. In the waning moments of the contest, with Holy Islam clinging to a two point lead, the Gefilte Fishes Ira Goldsteinbergspan was all alone underneath when Machmed Halij Abdul Kahmal Rauf pelted him with an ambrax missile. The refs ignored the infraction and the buzzer sounded with the El Hoopsters as champion. The non-call in question came right on the heels of a pair of Rauf free throws that gave Holy Islam the lead. While going for an alley-oop, Rauf was hit with a nuclear warhead. After nuclear winter subsided, he canned his two free throws. Holy Jew's coach argued the call to no avail, but then had to stand and watch as his star player was hit with a missile without so much as a flinch from the referee. Chemical weapons and nuclear capabilities are banned from this years games.

Handing the puck banned

Following the lead of the NFL's "throat cut" celebration ban, the National Hockey League will no longer allow a goal scorer to hand the puck to an opposing goalie or player.

"It sends the wrong message," NHL commissioner and tight ass Gary Bettmann said. "What happens when little kids start handing pucks to other kids. No kid deserves to be handed a puck. I don't care what he's done, that's just cruel. What kind of example are we setting? The NHL will continue to promote a family atmosphere and for parents out there, you have my pledge that there will be no puck handing at our games."

Letter to the Editor:

Please let me express my sincerest apologies to everyone active in the UMass lacrosse community.

What I did was completely immoral.

Using my power as an NCAA Men's Lacrosse Committee member, I convinced the board to overlook your Minutemen for selection to last year's NCAA Tournament field.

I mean, your Minutemen beat the absolute fuck out of my Hofstra team, 17-13. And when I say, beat the fuck, I really mean, just fucking totally drilled the fucking busted fuck out of us. If you were there, then you understand where I'm coming from.

For me to go and screw a team that went 12-2 out of the postseason...damn. That's total bullshit. I'm the ugliest motherfucker this here side of life. I'm a neutered virgin. And my dog just took a wild, diarrhea-crazy, juicy dump on my new penny loafers.

Plus, I go to Bingo halls and chent old ladies out of diminutive amounts of cash just so I can go buy flowers, tampons, and Barbies for my boyfriend Don Starsea, the head coach of the Virginia men's lacrosse team and NCAA Men's Lacrosse Committee member (If you don't recall, his team went 7-6 and we still put them in the Tournament).

So to go and fuck with UMass was insanely dense. I mean, I'm just one pathetic pill of Longitude. One modest piece of Hippo manure.

I suck, and I'm forever sorry. Excuse me as Tom Fallon and Matt McFarland go push me off a cliff.

Yours fucking brainless,

Henry "Oatfuckit" Royal

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's Water Polo

The Massachusetts men's water polo team was looking forward to a very successful 2003 campaign.

That was before they got cut.

Men's Basketball

In a surprise move, the NCAA has declared the Massachusetts men's basketball team National Champions for the 2002 season.

"We could let Maryland and Indiana decide the championship tonight," NCAA spokesman Richard Head said. "But really, only one team has shown itself clearly superior to all the others this year, and that is UMass.

"Just look at them – they beat Marist for Christ's sake, and I just don't know how many teams can say that."

Another reason for the Maroon and White's first ever championship included a win over North Carolina State, who beat Maryland in the ACC conference tourney, who would have had a chance to compete for the championship if UMass was not clearly superior.

"There is just no point in the playing the game," Head said. "It is an absolute travesty that the Minutemen did not make the Final Four, so we have chosen to remedy the situation. I can honestly say I have never made a more appropriate decision in my life. Mike Davis and Gary Williams should both give me a hug."

In other UMass basketball news, Jameel Pugh and Willie Jenkins have been banned from NCAA competition for life, simply because they are terrible at basketball.

"You saw them play," distraught head coach Steve Lappas said. "If they didn't transfer, I didn't know what I was going to do. I might have had to change my name to Bruiser."

Women's Basketball

Three UMass students died yesterday, apparently from the lingering shock that came when Stasia Robinson flashed her breasts during the Super Bowl riots in January.

Football

The Massachusetts football team has implemented a new type of off-season program this year, in which it has decided to enter the School of Modern Dance instead of competing in so-called, "football drills."

"I am just a huge Martha Graham fan," head coach Mark Whipple said "Basically, if we can just do what she did on the dance floor, there is absolutely no way teams like Hofstra and Maine can stop us.

This is just one step in the Minutemen's new attitude, as scoring points and actually playing defense will once again be highlighted in the UMass play book.

"We are implementing a new type of offense in which we actually try and score points," the fourth-year coach added. "I might have made a mistake last year with our offense that was designed to put virtually no points on the board. I just figured having two or three interceptions run back for touchdowns a game would eventually help us. It's possible I was wrong."

Moulin Rouge! Soundtrack! Part two!

Ewan McGregor and Nicole Kidman in Moulin Rouge soundtrack: the sequel.

Jim Broadbent finally gets his due on Part Two.

By Jennifer Eastwood
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Yes, Moulin Rouge had a following.

Last summer, it was difficult for one to turn on the radio and not come across the voices of Christina Aguillera, Mya, Pink and Lil' Kim singing the popular remake of "Lady Marmalade," one of the many songs redone in conjunction with the award-winning film.

Hype around the film's stars, Nicole Kidman and Ewan McGregor, its unique costuming and set design and its revolutionary use of music swelled over the summer, peaking these past weeks during film awards season.

The avid Moulin Rouge fan, caught in the magic of a love story between Christian (McGregor), a penniless writer searching for his place in the world, and Satine (Kidman), a beautiful courtesan intent on one day becoming a revered actress, wanted no more when walking out of the theater than to hear the film's spellbinding melodies once again.

So in good fashion, the avid fan rushed to purchase the original soundtrack... only to find it incomplete of all the film's music and sharing space with a number of songs in remixed versions.

Questions swarmed about the fan's mind. Where were all the songs featuring the voice of Jim Broadbent, a powerfully vocal bass who played the father figure Harold Zidler, the owner of the Moulin Rouge nightclub and pimp to Satine? What about the original versions of the film's main title or closing or the focal love song, "Come What May?" And where were instrumental themes that are so often found on soundtracks to movie musicals?

The answers lingered until late February when the album Moulin Rouge 2, a second soundtrack to the movie, premiered in hopes of finally bringing satisfaction to the avid Moulin Rouge fan.

Timing and marketing are everything in Hollywood, and the release of Moulin Rouge 2 is certainly no exception to that law. Those who could not wait to pop in a CD and hear the fun rhymes, "So exciting, the audience will stop and cheer/So delighting, it will run for 50 years/Spectacular! Spectacular!/No words in the vernacular/can describe this great event/ You'll be dumb with wonderment," set to the classic can-can melody would agree the new album is worth purchasing alongside the original soundtrack, even months after the film's initial release date.

Moulin Rouge 2 does, like its predecessing album, also include remixed music, specifically a unique version of "One Day I'll Fly Away," Kidman's song proclaiming Satine's plans for the future. Although mildly enjoyable on some bizarre level, the remix can be taken or left with little to no relevance.

Perhaps the most unexpected delight of this album however is the song, "Meet Me in the Red Room," a fun little tune sung by Amiel. It ensures to get one's foot tapping to its bright tempo, as it's played in its entirety on this soundtrack (versus just the introduction that is played as background music in the film itself).

One cannot either forget to acknowledge the closing credits theme, "Bolero." This captivating violin instrumental piece takes the listener on an entertaining and even sometimes haunting journey that reflects the "wild bohemian sprit that this whole production embodies."

Significant to note is that the songs on Moulin Rouge 2 are not provided in sequential order as they occur in the film. This random pattern along with the fact that there are only 11 songs on the album furthers the idea that the second soundtrack has been released to simply fill in the gaps of the first one and not necessarily meant to stand on its own.

Those already captivated by Moulin Rouge madness will appreciate Moulin Rouge 2 through and through, being unable to decide which soundtrack is truly better, for one has this song they really love and the other has that one.

Newcomers to Moulin Rouge melodies however would be advised to start with listening to the original. After all, it is what so grippingly enchanted the avid fan in the first place.

COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Here it is, Ladies and Gentlemen, my first "Top 10" music countdown. For lack of better terms, I feel like I'm writing for Rolling Stone. I've always wanted to do this and I'd like to "Thank the Academy" for making my dreams come true. Hope you make the time to get these artists and these songs. I really love them and I'd put money on the fact that you will too.

10) Frank Sinatra. There's hardly anything more romantic than the sound of ol' blue eyes singing "The Way you Look Tonight" or more uplifting than "I get a kick Out of You." If you like these, also check out any of the Starbuck's compilation CD's, Diana Krall, and Harry Connick Jr.

9) Fleetwood Mac. Stevie Nicks's voice 'rings like a bell through the night' in "Rhiannon," "Go Your Own Way" is a classic, and "Second Hand News" has a beat you won't easily forget. If you're a Fleetwood fan, don't forget to check out 'Legacy,' their tribute album, with such contributing artists as Shawn Colvin, Jewel, the Goo Goo Dolls and The Cranberries to name a few.

8) The Steve Miller Band. "The Joker" is one of the best summer songs that I can think of, not to mention "Take the Money and Run" or "Fly Like an Eagle." "Jungle Love" is rather amusing and "Rockin' Me" can't be missed.

7) The Eagles. Who could resists a little "Tequila Sunrise" or a vacation at the "Hotel California." "Already Gone" is incredibly catchy as well as "Take It Easy." Seriously, if you like classic rock, you need to have these Eagles songs in your music library.

6) Elton John. Who could possibly resist a blonde British man that wears ridiculously huge pink, plastic glasses and orange and pink pin stripe suits? You need to have "Tiny Dancer" and "Mona Lisas and Mad Hatters."

5) Jewel. "I'm Sensitive" is the sweetest, most angelic song that I have ever heard. From her new album, This Way, listen to "Everybody Needs Someone Sometimes." Don't miss the line: "Sister Mary used to be a nun/so she thought that she would get out/and have her some fun."

4) Sergio Mendez. There are few words to describe the harmonies of this Brazilian band. If you enjoy a good ethnic/jazz sound, check out "Mas Qui Nada," "Fool on the Hill" and "Scarborough Fair." There's sure to be plenty of shakin' going on and a lot of singing to some of their famous covers.

3) Sister Hazel. If you don't know their music, you need to listen. Right now. "All for You" is a Hazel classic (you have to hear the live version). Other fun songs include "Superman," "Happy," and "Look to the Children."

2) Weezer. C'mon, the blue album. Need I say more? Who could forget "The Sweater Song" or "Say It Ain't So?" The Green album is pretty good also. If you're a Weezer fan, you need to have "Island in the Sun" and "Photograph."

1) The Corrs. This is perhaps the best Celtic band I have ever heard. You may know their radio hits like "Breathless" or "So Young," but listen to their other songs, like "Old Town" and "Toss the feathers." they're fun, to get ars rocker moving and inspired.

Radio Scanning and 'Role playing' Make For Good Car Driving

If there's anything I love more than music, it's driving. And there is nothing I loathe more than having the opportunity to take a good drive, while being plagued with a crappy set list on the local station. With good music, its as though a person can become whatever the song wants you to become. Dial turning is as simple as relaxing on a warm summer's day.

As I was driving along over vacation, I started thinking about the effect that music has on my everyday mindset. If your anything like myself, You may experience car driving situations such as these:

Turn the radio on. First station hosts a light jazz program. I begin to envision low, blue-hued lighting, the taping of brushes on the snare drum, sksspada

Movies affect teen smoking study says

By Richard Lazarus
THE DARTMOUTH (DARTMOUTH COLLEGE)

(U-WIRE) HANOVER, N.H. — Teen-agers whose parents don't restrict their access to R-rated movies are more likely to experiment with alcohol and drugs, according to a study released last month by the Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center that has raised some old controversies about the role movies play in harmful behavior.

Controlling for other factors, teens whose parents never allowed them to watch R-rated movies were just one-quarter as likely to report having tried cigarettes compared with those whose movie watching was unrestricted. When parents restricted movie-viewing somewhat, teens were about three-quarters as likely to have experimented with cigarettes.

The study results are significant because they imply that strictly restricting children's access to R-rated movies may decrease the likelihood they will try smoking or drinking, editors of the journal that published the study wrote.

Only about one in six students were completely restricted from watching R-rated movies. Of these, only two percent had tried smoking.

How parents restricted students viewing movies also changed the likelihood the students would consume alcohol.

The study looked at over 4,500 students in 15 middle schools in New Hampshire and Vermont. It asked them which of 600 randomly sampled popular movies of various ratings they had seen and to evaluate what restrictions their parents placed on their movie watching.

Overall, 18 percent of students surveyed had tried cigarettes and 25 percent had tried alcohol.

Dartmouth Medical School professor Mike Beach, one of the co-authors of the study, emphasized that although parents' restrictions was a significant factor in whether students tried smoking, it was not the primary factor.

Whether friends had also tried smoking was a very significant factor in student experimentation. But the results of the study were conclusive even when controlling for these other factors in parental behavior.

In an editorial that accompanied the publication of the study, Dr. Stephen Glantz called for movie ratings to take into to account depiction of the use of cigarettes and alcohol.

A comprehensive study of the more than 600 movies sampled for the study found that R-rated movies generally depict more alcohol and cigarette use then other films, according to Beach.

The Motion Picture Association of America, the organization that rates films in the United States, already takes into account abuse of drugs in making its ratings, according to the MPAA's Web site, although Glantz wrote that they do not take in to account cigarette use.

MPAA spokesman Rich Taylor declined to comment on the study. The MPAA also declined to publish an accompanying editorial with Glantz after an initial period of interest according to Elective Clinical Practice the journal that published the study.

Women's laughter empowers, says speaker at Iowa State

By Katie List
IOWA STATE DAILY (IOWA STATE U.)

(U-WIRE) AMES, Iowa — The potential for laughter is just astonishing in our lives."

Gina Barreca, professor of English literature and feminist theory at the University of Connecticut at Storrs, editor of the Penguin Book of Womens Humors and columnist for the Chicago Tribune and Hartford Courant, conjured laughter from a crowd of nearly 200 Thursday night in the Sun Room of the Memorial Union. She spoke about "Humor and Creativity in Women's Lives."

Twining through stories of Italian aunts, women's bathroom talk and the less than-feminine nature of true women's laughter was a message of humor as a means of empowerment and relating to one another.

Focusing on women's humor, Barreca elicited guffaws when she demonstrated the difference between the "silver bell tinkling laughter" of polite women who, while wanting to acknowledge the speaker, aren't really listening to the loud, boisterous squawk of someone who is truly tickled.

Barreca physically demonstrated the various stages of women's laughter from "mascara wiping" to "bust-hold ing."

Barreca focuses on humor as a way of studying female roles in culture. Women's fear of hurting another, she said, limits their expression of humor, leaving them instead to coo and compliment.

"Nurturing and caring is good, but not if it puts a gag on you," Barreca said. "Women are taught to doublethink everything they say."

"I'm interested in who has a powerful voice in our culture and why, and maybe change it a little bit."

While appreciative of the differences between men and women's humor, especially concerning the antics of the "Three Stooges," she laughed at the idea of men being from Mars and women from Venus.

"We're all from the same planet the women are just in a poorer neighborhood," Barreca said.

Feminism is not what you can't do, but what you can, Barreca said. Several girls approached her on the first day of a class she taught, telling her that she "didn't look like a feminist."

"I assume that everyone's a feminist," Barreca said. "You have to give them the benefit of the doubt."

Stacy Brinker, sophomore in speech communication, had not attended any of the Women's History Month lectures, but was drawn to Barreca's because the topic sounded upbeat and comical.

"I found it interesting because it deals with women I'm interested in the topic," Brinker said.

Lawmakers blast Colorado

By Jessika Fruchter
COLORADO DAILY (U. COLORADO)

(U-WIRE) DENVER, Colo. – A group of Republican state senators and representatives are rushing to the defense of the University of Colorado-Boulder Jewish community, urging administrators to move beyond "legalisms" when discussing the increased tension on campus over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and move toward "strong moral leadership" instead.

During a press conference Thursday, held on the steps of the state's Capitol Building, Senator John Andrews, R-Centennial, said CU's President Elizabeth Hoffman had not taken a strong enough stance against what he called "anti-Semitic" activity.

Andrews said he is "convinced" Hoffman does not endorse such activity, but said he would like to see CU's president, along with other Boulder campus administrators, take steps to safeguard CU's Jewish community.

Andrews said he plans to meet with CU's Jewish group Monday to discuss the issue, but that he had no plans to meet with CU's Muslim Student Association.

Specifically, Andrews, along with Sens. Jim Dyer (R-Arapahoe/Jefferson Counties), Doug Lamborn (R-El Paso), Bruce Cairns (R-Arapahoe) and Reps. Lauri Clapp (R-Arapahoe) and Mark Paschall (R-Jefferson), pointed to the ongoing vandalism of Israeli flags on campus and threatening phone calls received by members of CU's Jewish group Hillel last semester.

The legislators also expressed concern about an alleged link to the charter of Hamas from CU's Muslim Student Association Web site, citing that taxpayer money was being used to support the site.

In a letter addressed to the CU Board of Regents and to Hoffman, the legislators called university policy toward racism and intolerance "hesitant."

"The nation is at war, and both houses of the Colorado General Assembly are nearing final passage of SB-113, 'concerning cooperation by institutions of higher education with federal anti-terrorism measures'," the letter read. "We call on CU's leadership to exemplify such cooperation by emphatically disavowing Hamas – bloodthirsty, genocidal suicide bombers."

Mistakenly referring to the Colorado Daily as "the student newspaper," the letter also criticizes the Daily for "falsely (dignifying)" Hamas as 'Palestinian militants'."

The letter also accused CU police of "proceeding less seriously" against "vandalism and threats to the campus Jewish group" than they did toward threats made against The Muslim Student Association shortly after Sept. 11. The accusation came even after CU's Hillel Director Devorah Friedman told the Colorado Daily she was satisfied with the progress CU police were making.

Legislators also condemned a recent lecture by CU professor Ward Churchill, in which he drew parallels between the United States policy toward American Indians and Israel's policy toward Palestinians. The lecture was sponsored by the Coalition for Justice in Palestine, a newly formed student group.

At Thursday's press conference, Andrews called Churchill's speech "vicious and anti-Israel."

He also expressed concern about security guards present during that event, calling the security presence "vicious, military-style, Islamic body guards," and noting that such a presence was intimidating in an academic environment.

Stuck in the middle with Wonderue

LITTLE WINGS
Wonderue
K Records

[illegible] can be a surreal place to live. Go far north to be [illegible] the fashionable fast [illegible] of Los Angeles [illegible] to buy into the [illegible] of San Francisco [illegible] Olympic home [illegible] front man Kyle [illegible] a place that is some [illegible] the time not only in [illegible] either as well. It's a [illegible] and all in [illegible] couples drive [illegible] streets and shop at [illegible] stores as farmers [illegible] Little Wings is [illegible] nothing number-ship [illegible] and song [illegible] group that has set [illegible] realms of the often [illegible] small section of the [illegible] population state. [illegible] album, the Wonder [illegible] Field's dark [illegible] and the feeling [illegible] for the feel of one of those old dusty records of church spirituals you might find when you pull over to the side of the highway to check out a swap meet in a lazy town. The recording is grainy and lo-fi, the instrumentation is sparse and slow, and Field sings with an uneven, jittery voice that sometimes rises into a cracked falsetto that, when he's lucky, barely reaches the high notes. Most of the songs on Wonderue are faint and serene meditations on the stars and parking lots and loves that have come and gone. Basically anything that's crossed Field's landscape is turned into a song.

A few of the songs on the album romp and shuffle over hand claps and feet stomps, like "Light Be Bright," a crooning country tune so lonesome and beautiful in its praise that it has the background singers yelling in appreciation. The album opener, "I filled with Wonder," is another alt country rocker, but, unlike "Light Be Bright," it is overloaded by too-happy lyrics that we've heard repeated endless times on those country radio stations that we can only stand to listen to for two seconds before we turn the tuning knob. This naivete and love for everything is sometimes too much to bear and is Wonderue's biggest flaw. But, for the most part, Field's shaky voice sings with so much earnestness that he can even make a line like "I'm in love with everyone and everything they've ever done," (from the beautiful "Faith Children") sound true to his aching heart.

Like the group Grandaddy (also from central California), Little Wings uses synthesizers and drum machines to its advantage. "When You Know Love," a tricky little call-and-response tune, is the best example of the combination of old-fashioned sensibilities and technology from the album. It even ends with a detached whiteboy hip-hop shout-out session, something reminiscent of the best of Beck's early albums. And Wonderue is sometimes as smooth and depressingly awesome as Coldplay's most tragic songs.

Without overtly admitting it, Wonderue is a sweet portrait of a place caught in the middle. Little Wings never leaves its hometown; every song leads back to the hills and homes of central California. As Field himself says on "Shredder Sequel," "cul-de-sacs still have their way with my heart at the end of the day."

Jewel: a must-have for the warm weather.

shop, and the quite, fragrant clanging of martini glasses over light whispers. A little Miles Davis sets my mood and I am transformed into a lovely, ladylike, jazz singer, dressed in a long lanky gown, red lips, hair pulled back. I am the most seductive lounge singer to hit the New York, Boston, or Chicago scene.

A quick change of the radio and I'm a hippie flower child, on acid perhaps, swaying like a perished daisy on a summer's breeze. I am dressed in beige linen with embroidered flowers, my black hair has suddenly gone dirty blonde, as I intently listen to the likes of Janis Joplin and Stevie Nicks.

No, no I'm not in the mood for either of these scenarios. A turn of the dial leads me to I. Lo's "I'm Real." As I cruise down the road in my parent's navy station wagon, I am now a shimmer, brunette with a chorus of backup dancers in tight pants and a handful of attractive young men behind me, mimicking my every move. We captivate our millions of fans with our black sparkly costumes, all the same, except for my sequin a-la-Britney Spears top hat.

This is good, but it still doesn't exactly suit my mood, so I click again, and oh yes, here it is: surging electric violins, cowboy hats, cattle ranch background, and a mess of red hair. This is the new scene in mind after switching past Shania Twain's "Who's Bed Have Your Boots Been Under." If you haven't heard it, you should, and if you don't like country, I don't care. Listen to it, its good. Suddenly, everything has turned foot stompin' and a stop sign or red light offers the perfect opportunity to "break on the beat," which I always find highly entertaining.

Oh and a little later I keep on switching until I find a good punk song like The Prizes's "UMass." I am now envisioning myself in my black plastic eyeglasses, gum in mouth, studded belt and ripped jeans, with a British flag pinned onto the front of my ripped baby doll tee. I have gone punk rock and I fear I may never return to my former self.

"We'll be back for another long set of your favorite tunes and groovin' oldies after these messages." Unfortunately, I am violently jolted by a commercial break into the cruel face of reality. I am not any one of these people.

Is this real? You decide.

All is quiet in State College

Chris Fiore notched a career-high five goals to help UMass defeat Penn State 13-12.

Lax pulls out win despite trailing throughout game

By Eric Soderstrom
COLLEGIAN STAFF

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. – It was one of those moments you know happened, but still struggle to remember anything else about it. There was one thing, however, that stuck out in the mind of Chris Fiore.

UMass	13
Penn State	12

"They got real quiet, real quick," said a smirking Fiore, just minutes after his Massachusetts men's lacrosse team scored two final-minute goals Saturday to upend Penn State 13-12 and hush the Nittany Lion faithful. "This is just unbelievable."

His Minutemen down 12-11 with 49 seconds left, Fiore cut to the middle of the field, made a pass fake, and while holding off a Penn State defender faced a rocket to the top shelf to tie the game at 12-12.

"I was ready to pass it," Fiore said. "But when I threw the fake the whole team went for it."

Nineteen seconds later, Don Little tossed a pass to Kevin Leveille who, despite playing one of the worst games of his career, fired a side shot to the low left corner for the game-winner. Dan Paccione won the ensuing face-off and UMass ran out the clock.

"It's a test of character," screamed junior Paul Hutchen, who played an integral part in retrieving both faceoffs before the Fiore and Leveille scores. "When you're down four goals and look at every guy on the bench and everyone knows you're going to comeback. That's just unbelievable."

Leveille's score, oddly coming on his first shot of the contest, gave the Minutemen the lead for the first time all afternoon and helped them (7-1, 2-0 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference) hang on for their seventh consecutive victory since a 12-11 overtime loss to Hofstra back on Feb. 23. The strike sent Penn State (3-4, 0-3) to its fourth consecutive loss since opening up the season with three straight wins.

The win also keeps UMass undefeated in the ECAC and aloft the conference standings with Georgetown (6-0, 2-0 ECAC), the team it is fighting with for the conference's automatic qualifier to the NCAA tournament.

The Minutemen, who host conference foe University of Maryland-Baltimore County next Saturday, have not lost on the road since a 17-7 defeat two years ago at Syracuse. And Saturday at Jeffrey Field, Penn State looked like the biggest opponent of that streak.

Up 8-4 with less than five seconds left in the first half, the Nittany Lions seemed rather contented in their opening effort. But that feeling soon faltered when Fiore, on a restart, launched a 30-foot flare to the left shelf with just one-second left.

"I just shot it," said Fiore, who led UMass with a career-high five goals. "It was a huge momentum booster."

Both teams started off slow in the second half, but Fiore found the net again at the 5:15 mark to bring the score to 8-6. Then, after a State tally, Paccione picked up a Marc Morels rebound and propped it into the cage to make it 9-7. But the Nittany Lions responded again when Jones raced around the UMass defense to give Penn State a 10-7 lead with 12:27 to play.

The lead wouldn't last long though, as a Paccione blast found the net just seven seconds later. And after goals from Fiore and Jeff Zywicki, the Minutemen knotted the game up at 10-10.

After a Mike Jacober goal gave the Nittany Lions a one-goal advantage, Morley's quickstick from Gene Tundo with 5:06 tied the game again at 11-11. State regained the lead just 20 seconds later on a goal by Will Cutler, but UMass ended the contest with its two strikes from Fiore and Leveille.

The Nittany Lions took a 3-0 lead in the first quarter, but the Minutemen scored the last three goals of the stanza. Fiore scored first with a low drive at the 6:01 mark, while Neil Lundburg and Don Little each found twine to tie the game at three. Penn State scored the first three times in the second quarter to take a 6-3 advantage. Morley scored off a rebound on an extra-man opportunity with 7:29 left to cut the lead to 6-4, but the Nittany Lions responded with two consecutive goals before Fiore's final-second marvel.

Minutemen muster enough heart to overcome deficit

MATTHEW F. SACCO

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. – When Chris Fiore reached the bench after tying the UMass-Penn State game at 12-12 with less than one minute remaining, the junior didn't know what to do with himself.

He couldn't keep steady long enough to receive a hug from captain Don Little and he certainly couldn't sit down. Fiore was relegated to excitedly pacing until he finally stopped and raised his arms and eyes toward the sky before letting out an ear-piercing scream. And as he lowered his vision to field level, Fiore had one last sound bite to offer.

"It's over," said Fiore in a significantly calmer tone. "It's our game boys. It's over."

But how could a down to the wire game like this one be over at 12-12, especially when Fiore's Minuteman squad hadn't led the entire contest? It's simple really – just ask Paul Hutchen.

"We've got more heart and more balls than anybody," Hutchen said. And after being down two late in the fourth quarter it was heart and, you know, that saw the Minutemen through to a 13-12 win over Penn State.

It was those traits that Hutchen mentioned that allowed senior Dan Paccione to win the three final faceoffs of the game, only the three most important draws of the season. They gave Hutchen himself the toughness to emerge from a virtual mosh-pit of players with the grounball that gave UMass the offensive possession that eventually tied the game. And it was those qualities that gave Kevin Leveille the resilience to bury the winner with a half minute remaining in maybe the worst game of his career.

"It was one good shot in a terrible game," a modest Leveille said after the game. "It was a team thing, a total team effort. I was just the one who had the shot."

No matter what the situation, the Minutemen have made a living of laying it on the line and this day was no different.

Despite the talent that broods from the roster, the Minutemen's Achilles heel can be found in the faceoff circle, where the lack of a seasoned draw man has put a dent in UMass' time of possession.

Consider that until the Penn State game, the Minutemen had won the faceoff war only once, against lowly Hartford. In Saturday's game, the Nittany Lions held a 14-10 edge on draws with under five minutes remaining. But Paccione and freshman Craig Conn showed that guts can outweigh talent.

After Penn State's Will Cutler gave PSU an 11-10 lead with under five minutes remaining, Conn abused fellow frosh Marc Young and fed Morley for the equalizer.

Then following another Penn State tally, Paccione stepped in to the circle and won three consecutive draws that resulted in Fiore's tying goal, Leveille's winner and the possession that ran out the clock.

No other team in the country has been able to duplicate what it is that allows this UMass team to find motivation and belief in the direst of circumstances. It must be something in the Pioneer Valley water. Nah, it's not that, it's simply that every single challenge that this team has faced it has passed – and it's been stronger for it.

Think about the death of teammate Eric Soprecasa three years ago and the two consecutive losing seasons, and then last year's NCAA selection committee travesty. It's no wonder that this team can shrug off a late two-goal deficit with relative ease.

So when you think about it, Penn State and their fans shouldn't be so surprised that the game they had seemingly owned, left town on a King Ward charter bus. But obviously the fans didn't get it. In fact they were utterly shocked. Because as Fiore pointed out after, they were quiet, real quiet.

Boston College dead at 139

Eagles accidentally kill themselves in Southie

By The Boston Globe
COLLEGIAN TOILET PAPER

Boston College died Sunday afternoon in what the Boston Police Department has classified an attempted murder/accidental suicide.

"On Sunday March 31, at around 3 p.m., Boston College was sitting in the Shannon Tavern in South Boston drinking large amounts of alcohol," the B.P.D.'s reports states. "At approximately 3:12 p.m., when the University of Massachusetts entered the Shannon Tavern, B.C. pulled out a gun and fired three shots at UMass. The Minutemen ducked, however, avoiding all three bullets. The Eagles, visibly frustrated, started to charge UMass, but in the process, B.C. tripped over an empty Sam Adams beer bottle. It was during that plunge that Boston College's semi-automatic pistol went off and sent a bullet right through its own head."

B.C. was rushed to Mass. General hospital immediately but was pronounced dead at 3:31 p.m. The Eagles were 139 years old.

As expected, the Boston community is mourning the loss of its shitty, cock-sucking, illegitimate, trust fund, genetically engineered to be an asshole, baby.

"Fuck," said B.C. sophomore Colby Adamson, who luckily found himself in an off-campus Starbucks when Boston College died. "Now I'll have to go to another really snobby private school."

People in Western Mass. reacted much differently.

"This is so fucking great," said UMass sophomore Dan McPhee when he first heard B.C. had taken a blast to the cranium. "I didn't even like fucking them broads." Others were just worried about themselves.

"I just can't believe this," said Bob Ryan, a columnist for The Boston Globe's Sports section. "Now I'm going to have to pay for blow-jobs."

UMass, typically not fond of B.C., its broads, or Bob Ryan, has scheduled a parade for tomorrow at 1 p.m. The Patriots' Adam Vinatieri, who will be making an appearance on the lead float, commented late last night on Sports Final (WBZ, Channel 4) on his disgust for Boston College.

"Boston College can suck my dick," said Vinatieri, in an interview with local sports television personality Bob Lobel. "And you too, Lobel. Go fuck yourself. Fuck you and your B.C. dick-sucking ways. And fuck The Globe, too."

"I haven't talked to the Eagles in 138 years," B.U. said. "When I raped Harvard and got it pregnant, I wanted to abort. But the fucking Crimson decided to have the baby. I was fucking bullshit. I knew the offspring would suck. I'm sorry, America. It wasn't my decision."

UMass-Boston, quoted yesterday by Bob Behler of WHMP Sports, said it witnessed Boston College kill itself.

"I was working the bar," the shitty campus said. "Right before the real UMass walked in, B.C. had just finis-hed its 12th Shirley Temple, and was fucking destroyed. I would have cut the Eagles off, but I fucking hate Boston College. It deserves to die."

BC is dead. Rejoice

Boston University, Boston College's father, wasn't too depressed when it first heard of B.C.'s death.

Al Skinner, head coach of the Boston College men's basketball team, was at Drexel University taking coaching lessons when B.C. passed away.

"Shit man, B.C. was the only school that'd give me a job," said Skinner, trader extraordinaire. "I'm not going to be able to coach anywhere. Maybe I'll ask Bruiser (James Hint) if I can be his assistant."

Steve Lappas, head coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team, released a statement yesterday commenting on Boston College's death.

"B.C. was a great school," the release says. "Wait, no it wasn't. There's two O's in 'B.C., go fuck yourself."

"The plaque for Boston College is in the Ladies Room," Lappas continued, on somewhat of a Top Gun hinge. "B.C.'s lost that living feeling."

"No, it hasn't," this reporter responded.

"Yes, it has," Lappas said. "I love it when it does that.

"That reminds me of a time when I got on as a looper at Chestnut Hill," mused Lappas, now on a Caddyshack kick. "So who you think they give me? Boston College, itself. The ugly chicks. The snotbag assholes. The really ugly chicks. Shitty lacrosse team. Not striking.

"So we finish 18, and they're going to stiff me. So I go 'hey, Eagles, how about a little something, you know for the effort?' Then, B.C. says, 'there won't be any money, but on your deathbed, you will inherit a $120,000 debt for four years of education.'

"So I've got that going for me. Which fucking sucks."

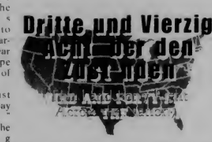
Professional Wrestling

In a move three times as important as the return of Michael Jordan to the NBA, Professional Wrestling's WWF has brought back legendary hero Hulk Hogan to the ring.

Hogan, who won the WWF title at least five times in the 1980s returned to the sport earlier this year at the ripe young age of 10(

"I just couldn't stay away," exclaimed the aging Hulkster. "I realized last year, that at 105 years old, my time on this earth is futile. There will soon come a day where my body will no longer be able to engage in immensely homoerotic activity. I knew then, that I needed to cherish every flailing opportunity I have left to feel another man's bulging penis pressing against a tiny speedo, resting on my back. I had to return."

Hogan's homecoming marked a triumphant match last month at WrestleMania against current WWF Superstar The Rock.



"The Rock has done seeming less steroids than other guys I have wrestled in the past," Hogan said. "The whole WWF has. You can tell the amount of steroids a man has done by the size of their testicles. When The Rock shoved my head in his crotch to do his signature move, the Rock Bottom, I noticed that the balls that were bouncing off my forehead were much larger than those of Randy "Macho Man" Savage, when my face was planted between his legs at WrestleMania Five. Back then, Savage and I joked later that if he shot up one more time his balls would be non-existant, and instead of marrying Miss Elizabeth, he'd have to proclaim himself her "sista-in."

Hogan's future in professional wrestling has become unclear. He said Mother Nature just may not be that kind anymore. "Ya know brother," he said, "I've been eating my Hulk Hogan chewable vitamins for 96 years now. There's only so much a man can take. Though before I retire again, I'd still love to put my head in between Stone Cold Steve Austin's crotch. I never did the white trash thing before."

When asked if by "Eating my Hulk Hogan chewable vitamins," Hogan actually meant, "shoving dirty hypodermic needles filled with muscle enhancing supplements into his veins," he simply smiled, removed his speedo and proved to the world that his nuts are in fact, down for the count.

Camel Wrestling

Ever wonder where that phrase, "Fighting like cats and dogs," came from? It might've came from the fact that cats and dogs like to fight. What we can't understand is why there was never a phrase, "Fighting like Camels in Turkey." Because we all know, Turkish camels fight like cats and dogs.

Last summer the annual, Camel Wrestling festival took place in the Aegean region of the country. Explained in a recent report of the event, "Bull camels normally wrestle and butt one another in a knock-out contest for precedence in a herd, and more importantly, precedence in mating."

To make the mating portion of the event more emphasized, before the two camels fight, a young cow is brought into the arena to, according to the report, "Get the camels excited."

The report claims you can tell camel is excited when it begins to ooze streams of viscous, milky saliva from its mouth.

All of this talk about camels wanting to have sex, and oozing milky fluids, encouraged Third and 48 to contact our human mating expert, Larry, at Route 9's Adults Only shop for information on whether or not this is a suggested manner of finding a sexual partner. Unfortunately, Adults Only took yesterday off to celebrate a holiday where a furry creature hops up and down, leaving chocolate balls for the children. So Larry was nowhere to be found.

We're pretty sure Larry would've agreed with us though, when we say, luckily human mating is not determined the same way Turkish camels do it. If it were, the only people fathering children would be men with enormous biceps and huge head- they nor-

Sex teams head new additions

By Chester Q. Poopypants
COLLEGIAN FUNNYMAN

The UMass Athletic Department announced this weekend that it would be adding eight new intercollegiate athletic programs to replace the recently slashed teams. Athletic Director Bob Marcum held a press conference Saturday to discuss the new changes in UMass sports.

"These eight new teams will do wonders to solidifying our place as America's leading athletic program," Marcum said. "We continue to move toward the future, leaving behind the complete shittiness of our former teams that brought total disgrace to this school."

Marcum added that "the University is now proud to announce that with the addition of the teams, UMass now has the highest ratio of fucking hot athletes with big, luscious boobs." According to the NCAA, Daytona Beach University previously held this distinction.

First on the new addition list is men's and women's tiddlywinks, making UMass one of only three schools in New England to compete in this sport on a varsity level (MIT and Amherst College are the others). Marcum described tiddlywinks as a "fun sport, similar to quarters in that you try to flick objects into a cup, just without the fun of getting completely and utterly wasted."

Associate Athletic Directors Nick Joos and Elaine Sortino headed the committee to select a new head coach, and finally decided on 13-time U.S. Champ Larry Kahn. He will coach both teams, mostly due to the fact that the committee could not find anyone else admitting to having tiddlywinks experience.

"Kahn brings an enormous amount of expertise to UMass and to the sport of tiddlywinks," Joos said. "And with most people not knowing what the fuck tiddlywinks is, we figure we might be able to catch a few teams off-guard and compete."

Kahn said in a released statement that he looks forward to joining the Amherst community, and hopes the town welcomes him with open arms, despite being a "total friggin' loser who throws shit into a big cup."

Also added, starting next semester, are men's, women's, and co-ed varsity sex. A recently added sport to the NCAA, teams will compete in front of a panel of judges, similar to figure skating, and will be awarded points based on technique, originality, and decibel level of screams. Marcum's petition to be included as a judge in competition was denied due to conflict of interest, but he still expressed delight at the opportunity of UMass to field the teams.

"Our jobs of a volleyball team only could bring in like 200 fans a night, gymnastics could barely draw anyone," Marcum said. "But if my hunch is correct, we'll be able to sell out Mullins every night with the squads we have coming in.

"Who wouldn't pay $10 a ticket to watch women dyke it out, or two talented student-athletes going at it doggy-style? Fans might even learn a thing or two," he added.

According to the department UMass has strong recruiting classes coming in for all three teams, especially the women. Heading that team is high school All-American Sunshine LeRoux, out of Lowell, Mass.

"I have a size 44H cup, so that should help me out against a lot of these teams," LeRoux said. "I've been playing ever since I was nine years old, so I think UMass will benefit from my experience."

Beloved porn stars Ron Jeremy and Jenna Jameson will serve as mutual head coaches for the co-ed team. Previous head coach of the men's tennis team, Judy Dixon, will stay with the department as coach of the women. A men's coach has yet to be determined as of press time.

Men's bolfing will also be added for the Fall 2002 season. Bolfing, an activity perfected by the Sci-Fi fuck tards that hit each other with Nerf bats in the Campus Center loading dock, will give normally unathletic UMass students an opportunity to shine.

"I look at these kids," Joos said. "They're fat, they don't shower, and they're grossly ignorant. They're the kind of kids who got shoved into lockers and were forced to eat mud in high school.

"They've never had the thrill of winning anything or feeling any sort of self-worth, so the Athletic Department will finally give them a chance," he added.

Co-ed ballroom dancing and women's mud wrestling round out the additions to UMass athletics. The new sports will keep UMass in accordance with Title IX, Marcum said.

"Thankfully, we'll be able to follow the federal law, so whacko feminists don't come screaming discrimination at us."

When asked if these new sports will be able to compete like the men's water polo team, who recently competed in the Final Four, Marcum said, "the team went to the Final Four?"

The brand new Powers that be

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Newly elected President Dave Carr and Student Trustee Bill Powers is awaiting this Wednesday's Student Government Association Senate meeting, which will call for the ratification of this year's elections.

The elections, which took place this past Wednesday and Thursday, proved to be a success despite concerns of having a lower voter turnout than previous years. The elections came through with over five percent of the needed student voter turnout, over 2100 votes.

"One reason I feel that our campaign went well was because we hit the nail on the head, we campaigned issues that students want to deal with as well as us," Powers said. "We didn't try to reach the moon, we picked issues that were realistic and we ended up getting almost the same voter turnout as we did last year."

Issues that were raised by Powers and Carr for this upcoming year are those surrounding Parking Services, public safety and academics. Both expressed the need to address safety at the University of Massachusetts, as well as reinstate the currently cut Escort Service.

"From my understanding, it's a $1 million program that is given to public safety through residential housing, and we want to find ways to make it more effective," Powers said. "We're going to be working with Parking Services and making sure that when parking fees go up, they are necessary, that students aren't targeted, and that lot prices stay the same."

Carr further addressed the security issues by explaining that the escort service was not only used as a P.R. tool, but a way to draw students to come to the University.

"I am going to be working to bring back the Escort Service. Housing Services is spending a million dollars on a system that they don't oversee," Carr said. "It's an important program and a great tool to have on this campus especially right now when were trying to attract students to this institution."

Academics were also a topic of discussion, as Carr and Powers both put much of their campaign's emphasis on academic programming at UMass. Carr explained that he felt that students are at UMass in order to get an education and that cutting departments is unacceptable.

"We want to improve academic programs and in turn improve the campus through them," Carr said.

With budget cuts taking its toll at UMass, questions as to what the future may hold for the newly elected Executive branch have come in to question. Powers, Carr and Speaker Aaron Saunders explained that they would be participating in both closed and open meetings with the three finalists in the new chancellor search. Open meetings will be taking place today, Thursday and Friday in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center from 2:45 p.m. to 3:45 p.m.

Saunders expressed the need for student involvement with the new chancellor search. He further explained that members of the SGA would be addressing the Fair Share Act with the perspective candidates in order to get their views on what effects the budget cuts should have on the administration.

MASSPIRG to host upcoming awareness events

By Frances Carr
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts chapter of Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) will hold two events this week in an effort to promote National Homeless and Hunger Awareness Week.

Tomorrow, on the Student Union steps facing the campus pond and spilling out over the lawn, organizers will host the "MASSPIRG Day Sleepout." The event, which begins at 11 a.m. and will go on all day, will focus on educating people about hunger in Massachusetts and encourage them to pay attention to the statistics. Participating students will be in sleeping bags and cardboard boxes and dressed in trash bags. Students hope to convey what it is like to be homeless.

On Saturday, April 6, MASSPIRG plans to come together along with an estimated 200 students and community members at Amherst Common for the 18th Annual Hunger Clean Up. The day's events will combine hands-on service and fundraising. Nicole Potvin, MASSPIRG co-coordinator for the hunger and homelessness campaign, said that the day is intended to be a "Volunteer-a-thon." She encouraged students to partake, saying it was a positive outlet for "people that want to give back to their community."

According to MASSPIRG member Laura Kyser, the day will begin at 10 a.m. when breakfast will be served and donations will be collected. At 10:30, David Sharken, Director of the Food Bank of Western Mass., will speak briefly. At 11a.m., volunteers will disperse to 12 local sites where they will be providing community service. Jobs will include painting homeless shelters, planting at the Food Bank Farm, sorting food and clothing donations and picking glass off the streets of Holyoke. At 3 p.m., participants will meet back at the common for food and to hear local band Fall Into Ruin perform.

Half of the proceeds will go to an area organization of MASSPIRG's choice, 35 percent will go to the National Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness (NSCAHH) and 15 percent will go to the Girl-Child Network, which helps provide women from Zimbabwe who are at risk for domestic violence with skills and education.

According to the UMass chapters' website, "MASSPIRG is a statewide, student directed and funded organization that works on environmental, consumer protection, and democracy issues. MASSPIRG's mission is to watchdog special interests like big banks, oil companies, and auto companies, to hold our politicians accountable, and to ensure that our interests as citizens are protected."

To make a donation or for further information, contact the MASSPIRG office in the student union in room 423A or call 545-0199. On the Net: www.umass.edu/rso/massprig.

'Who Stole Feminism' author to speak today

THE AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE

Christina Hoff Sommers, who will speak in the Campus Center today.

Christina Hoff Sommers, one of America's most outspoken opponents of contemporary feminism, will be speaking in Room 101 of the Campus Center at 1:00 p.m. today. Her lecture is titled, "The Death of the Feminist Movement."

Sommers, a former professor of philosophy at Worcester's Clark University, is the author of the 1994 bestseller Who Stole Feminism?: How Women Have Betrayed Women, a condemnation of extremist elements in the women's rights movement. In Who Stole Feminism?, Hoff Sommers accuses feminist icons such as Gloria Steinem, Naomi Wolf, and Catherine McKinnon of betraying the movement's original ideals.

Hoff Sommers declares herself to be an "equity feminist," supportive of equal rights for men and women, and assails the "gender feminists" who she believes have hijacked the feminist cause. She accuses these so-called "gender feminists" of viewing human relations only through the lens of male oppression and female victimization, and of promoting discrimination against men.

Her book was denounced by feminist leaders, who suggested that Hoff Sommers based her research on anecdotal evidence rather than reliable data, and that she was guilty of attacking the women who made her own successes possible. In spite of their criticisms, however, the book became a bestseller. Many authors, most notably Cathy Young, author of Ceasefire: Why Men and Women Must Work Together to Achieve True Equality, have since penned similar works.

Since writing Who Stole Feminism?, Hoff Sommers has authored a number of other commentaries on the gender wars. Her most recent book is The War Against Boys: How Misguided Feminism is Harming Young Men, in which she criticizes educational programs that leave male students at a disadvantage. In The War Against Boys, she argues that the movement to "feminize" education, led by Harvard Professor Carol Gilligan, has led to an atmosphere in which normal, healthy male behavior is punished.

Hoff Sommers has also been an outspoken critic of Eve Ensler's The Vagina Monologues, a feminist play which is being performed with increasing regularity on college campuses [and which drew sold-out crowds to the Campus Center Auditorium in February].

In an editorial published in USA Today, Hoff Sommers wrote, "Theatergoers find some of the [The Vagina Monologues] amusing. But its more serious preoccupation is exposing male insensitivity and violence. It offers a rogues' gallery of oafs, brutes, adulterers, rapists, child molesters, and vile little boys...[It] appears dedicated to the proposition that women are from Venus and men are from hell."

Sommers' views have earned her a number of critics. Former National Organization for Women President Patricia Ireland once described Hoff Sommers and like-minded anti-feminists as "the women who walked through the doors of opportunity that feminists kicked open."

Since leaving her position at Clark University, Hoff Sommers has gone on to work as a fellow for the American Enterprise Institute. Her articles about gender issues have been published in The Wall Street Journal, The Boston Globe and The New England Journal of Medicine, among others.

National Briefs

Alabama

By Beth Anderson
THE VANGUARD (U. SOUTH ALABAMA)

(U-WIRE) MOBILE, Ala. — The University of South Alabama may be facing legal action based on findings of race discrimination within the housing department. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission launched an investigation into the university after USA Educational Support Personnel Organization President Ken Finley filed a complaint on the behalf of four USA painters who claimed they were subjected to race and age discrimination on the job.

Details outlined in Finley's complaint included denial of promotion, disparities in pay and job assignments and demeaning treatment from supervisors.

The allegations also included age-based discrimination however the EEOC cleared the university of such charges.

The EEOC charged the university March 15 with violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which prohibits employers from discrimination based on age, race, sex or national origin. EEOC is a federal agency with the power to investigate allegations of workplace discrimination and can file suit on behalf of employees.

USA was given until March 29 to respond to the agency's findings. In a letter to Otho Cresap, the EEOC's investigator with the case, Associate University attorney Katheryn Powers stated the university could not respond to the allegations sufficiently to do so on the basis of the charge without violating confidential mediation regulations.

University spokesman Keith Ayers said the matter is participated in mediation with the EEOC that "came to no result."

Peterson's letter stated the university "would very much like to fully participate with the EEOC in an investigation of this matter."

Croom did not return phone calls from The Vanguard.

Ayers said the university will issue an official response this week.

"The University of South Alabama employs an aggressive program of non-discrimination and will vigorously defend itself against this type of allegation," Ayers said in a statement issued last week. "The university believes these claims are without merit and looks forward to substantiating that position through due process in court."

Florida

By Lauren Crane
FLORIDA STATE UNIVERSITY (FLORIDA STATE U.)

(U-WIRE) TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Florida State University, first day of class, freshman year, 1973. Riding to campus from Osceola Hall, Ric Crane recalls the miraculous event that unfolded in front of him.

"I was just riding my bike to class when suddenly an entire girl's dorm streaked naked right through my path," he said. "It was crazy."

"I think I had that dream the other night," sophomore Dusty Noble said.

To much surprise, the event described above is not a fabrication — it actually happened. Florida State University popularized the trend of streaking which later turned into a nationwide craze.

"I remember each dorm would get together and plan their time to streak," FSU alumni Ric Crane said. "It was insane. People would run across campus naked, jump on the bus, it even got so bad that they opened up Landis Green."

The police got so fed up with students streaking, that Landis Green was open for 24 hours, making it legal to be naked. Thousands gathered, nude and proud, and legally exposed as long as they stayed in the perimeters of the giant green field.

"I can't even imagine FSU being so tolerant now," sophomore Taylor Lee said. "But I guess it was the '70s."

Starting from the beginning, the Greeks (ancient, not fraternities and sororities) were the first to streak. It wasn't out of the ordinary for athletes to display their strength and stamina by racing naked in front of Athenian crowds.

"I don't get the point of streaking," sophomore Tom Hayes said.

Whether it is in protest, initiation into a fraternity, for traditional importance, or just plain shock value, people have always been fascinated with streaking.

Streaking caught widespread attention in the '70s, so much that national streaking polls were created.

"I remember FSU was No. 1 in the nation for four months straight on the streaking poll," Alumni Ric Crane said. "Even Time magazine and Newsweek did a story on us."

Streaking, though seemingly innocent, can result in a misdemeanor charge — or even the loss of numerous bodily appendages to a tree branch or passing bicyclist that gets in one's way.

Not to say bad things happen to those who streak; Washington and Lee University officials said that streaking has occurred as early as 1804, citing records that student William Crimp was charged with "running naked through the streets."

This student later went on to serve in the House Representative and as U.S. ambassador to Chile.

Many thought that the fad of streaking would eventually wear off but it hasn't. Though not as popular as it was before, the action has yet to die.

"I think people are much more keen on watching than in actually participating in things like streaking," junior Bryan Moskowitts said.

This is probably correct. Why buy the cow if you can get the milk for free?

"All I can say is that it was great, it was crazy, everyday was a new adventure," Crane said.

TUFTS DAILY (TUFTS U.)

(U-WIRE) MEDFORD, Mass. — More than 100 people looked on in shock as two three-story Medford homes were destroyed by a four-alarm fire Friday afternoon. No one was injured in the fire, but two residences rented by Tufts University students were also damaged.

Students, administrators, and Medford residents lined the streets as 20 fire engines from at least eight departments fought the flames at the corner of Capen and Winthrop streets for more than three hours.

Biology Professor Victoria Meller and another Tufts staff member lived at the now-destroyed 44-46 Winthrop Street but were not home at the time of the fire.

The Medford Fire Department placed early estimates of property damage in the range of $1 million.

"They're pretty much gone," Medford Fire Department Deputy Edward O'Brian said of the houses at 7 Capen Street and 44-46 Winthrop Street. "There'll be structural damage, major structural damage." Fire hoses, which shoot thousands of gallons of high-pressure water per minute, were a large cause of the destruction.

The fire started around 2:45 p.m. at 7 Capen Street and spread quickly to the neighboring structures.

Gail Landry, a resident of 46 Winthrop Street, said she heard a loud explosion while in her kitchen. She watched as the second of two motorcycles under the porch of 7 Capen Street blew up in front of her eyes. Minutes later, Landry was chased out of her house by the flames.

Medford fire officials have not determined the cause of the blaze.

"They're leaning towards the motorcycles ... that is probably the cause," O'Brian said. "It's under investigation, and it will be for a while."

The houses at 7 Capen and 44-46 Winthrop were completely gutted by the fire and the roofs of both homes collapsed. The garage of 50 Winthrop Street, a house rented by students, also burned to the ground.

Fire Trucks from Cambridge, Somerville, Somerset, Medford, Arlington, Massport, Malden, and Winchester were all called in to fight the fire.

Many administrators were at the scene consoling those involved, including President Larry Bacow, Deans of Students Bruce Reitman, Dean of Judicial Affairs Veronica Carter, and Residential Life Coordinator Jen Bevins.

Three Capen Street — the home of 13 Tufts students next-door to where the blaze began — suffered minimal structural damage. Part of the roof was lost to the fire, and some clothing was damaged by water when firefighters entered the house to fight the flames at the rear of 7 Capen Street.

But the house is without electricity, gas, and water, and students are temporarily residing at the Best Western Hotel in Alewife. The landlord's insurance is paying for the stay. Meller will reside with a friend for the time being.

Tufts is also be assisting those affected by the fire, Reitman said. "We're providing help if they need it — coordinating clothing donations, providing meals, contacting professors if they lost books," he said.

Bevins said that the displaced students were offered free meal vouchers from Tufts and will be given housing if needed. The students who live at 3 Capen St. expect to return home soon.

Alabama med student part of child porn ring

By Jennifer Wright
THE VANGUARD (U. SOUTH ALABAMA)

(U-WIRE) MOBILE, Ala. — A University of South Alabama medical student charged with being part of a massive Internet child pornography ring known as "Operation Candyman" was arrested on March 19 at his west Mobile, Ala., residence in the Colonial Village Apartments on Hillcrest Road.

March 22, Michael Adam Davidson, 26, was ordered by U.S. Magistrate Judge Bert Milling into his parents' custody on the condition that he undergo psychiatric treatment in a hospital in Peoria, Ill. The judge also ruled that hospital officials are to notify authorities five days before they plan to release him.

In a March 19 press release by the FBI, a federal arrest warrant was issued for Davidson, following the filing of a federal criminal complaint in violation of title 18, United States code, section 2252A. This section specifically criminalizes the reception and transmission of child pornography.

Following the search warrant, FBI agents seized from Davidson's residence computer equipment that contained graphic depictions of children being raped or taking part in various sex acts.

According to USA spokesman Keith Ayers, Davidson, whose studies included pediatric shifts at USA Children's and Women's Hospital, has been temporarily suspended pending the outcome of the case.

Davidson's arrest is a direct result from investigation leads developed by the FBI in connection to the Internet E-group named "Operation Candyman."

This Web site was specifically designed for the uploading, downloading and transmission of child pornography via the Internet, according to the search warrant affidavit.

The purpose of the E-group was stated on the Web site, "This group is for people who love kids. You can post any type of messages you like too or any type of pics and videos you like. P.S. If we all work together we will have the best group on the net."

The Web site membership was free and featured directions to stop receiving e-mails at anytime, according to the affidavit.

The Web site included a file section, an e-mail list, polls and a chat section. The file section allowed members to post images or video files for others to download. Every member was a part of the e-mail list, and every time an e-mail was sent to the group, it was distributed to every member.

Authorities believe the group involved more than 7,000 members world wide.

In memorium

A memorial service was held for Dr. Barbara Burn, who served as the Associate Provost of International Programs, in Bowker Auditorium. Many professors and administrators, including Marcellete Williams and William Bulger, attended Dr. Burn's memorial. Both Williams and Bulger spoke of the role Burn played at the University.

"We are going to be asking each candidate how they would work with us on the Fair Share Act," Saunders said. "It's really disheartening how the administration has responded to the Act, which is really unfortunate, but does give us a lot of merit to go on."

Saunders continued by explaining that the SGA has not given up on the Fair Share Act, and that going to the Associate Press and The Boston Globe again is not out of the question.

"We haven't sent a press release that has not yet been printed by the Associate Press or The Boston Globe and we will probably go back there again," Saunders said. "There are lots of options open to the administration."

Powers agreed with Saunders, however, taking a different approach. Powers explained the need for a solid working relationship, as well as the need for better communication between the administration, the SGA and the student body.

"I really want to spend a lot of time working with the new chancellor and what they want for this campus, and bring a student vision to them," Powers said. "Decisions can't be topped down from the administration or myself. People need to buy into this university and know what is going on, and that starts with communication within the administration and the SGA and back to the students."

In an effort to get more student involvement in the University and the recent budget cuts, Carr and Powers have been working with SCFRA (Student Center for Education Research Advocacy) on getting state legislatures at UMass. Legislatures will be visiting the University later on this week in an effort to see what the University is dealing with on a student-based perspective.

Carr explained the need for the University to be recognized as the flag ship school it has always been labeled as.

"We're not getting the respect of a flagship school, and we are the largest public institution in New England," Carr said. "We won't get money or respect unless we get our legislatures out here to see it for themselves and that is what where doing this week."

Powers will take his position as the new Student Trustee on July 1; Powers will further carry out his duties as Associate Speaker until the end of the Senate's term.

Carr will be taking the role of student body president after the elections are ratified and he is sworn into office, in which he will have 30 days to appoint his cabinet. Nomination papers will be available in the SGA office.

Members of the SGA Senate will be meeting this Wednesday in order to discuss a variety of issues surrounding the budget cuts as well as possible changes in the University's alcohol policy.

The Senate passed a motion in Fall 2001 regarding the need for the administration to change the alcohol policy and specifically the removal of students from dormitories after their second offense. The administration met with SGA members to discuss the issue and possible changes for the Fall 2002 semester.

"Right now it's all really preliminary, but I wouldn't expect the final draft to be very different, there are still a few gray areas to be worked out," Saunders said.

The newly drafted alcohol policy would allow students two chances. The first is a written warning and a $50 fine, and the second offense results in another $50 fine as well as alcohol awareness classes. However upon the third instance involving an alcohol related offense, students will face a deferred housing removal. This would result in the removal of relocation of the student to a different area on campus, or just a possible suspension pending the situation. Students will still have the opportunity to appeal charges if they have appropriate and concrete evidence to support themselves.

"This is a welcomed change because it would get rid of housing relocation upon the second offense. Right now, you are removed from your current residence and not allowed to return, and that is a disruption of a student's life," Saunders said. "There are also changes in the definitions within the alcohol policy, especially in dealing with minor to major infractions. However, there are still some gray areas that are up to interpretation, and we'll be discussing them further."

Members of the SGA will be meeting to further discuss these issues at 7 p.m. Wednesday night in Room 168C of the Campus Center.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

COLLEGIANEDITORIAL@YAHOO.COM ED/OP EDITOR: MATTHEW DESPRES

Middle East situation:

Hope dimming daily

The latest rash of suicide bombings in Israel has spurred the Israeli military into an all-out onslaught on the Palestinian government and people. Troops are searching door-to-door for Palestinian militants and caches of weapons. People are dying. An 11-year-old boy was killed while playing near the market in Rafah in the Gaza Strip. "Almost everyone we get is dead not wounded, but shot dead on the spot," said an emergency doctor Muhammed Butrawi.

Things are horrific over there, and they're getting worse.

Which leaves only one reasonable question: is anyone really surprised?

Militant Palestinians and their suicide bombings have been breeding fear and uncertainty in Israel for months now. They're cheap, scary, terrorist attacks on civilians. When people live in fear, they lash out. It's not the most reasonable reaction. It's not the best reaction. It may even be the worst reaction. But it's the most common reaction, and the most instinctual.

Israel is sick of watching civilians die at the hands of wingnuts. While negotiations and cease-fires have never stopped being an option, Israel is sick of holding to each renewed cease-fire only long enough to watch another cafe or shopping mall blow up. Rash actions lead to more rash reactions – while it may not be the right reaction for the Israeli government to seek out Palestinian militants and the weapons that they have horded in hide-outs, it's all that they have left.

By taking military action, Israel has taken a stand against terrorism. It may be right. It may be wrong. Enough of their civilians and people have died. Much like the United States, Israel has decided to openly seek out those that plot against them. Because of the nature of the attacks on them, there is no way for Israel to fight a fair battle against the Palestinians. Cheap shot after cheap shot has led to Israel taking an angry stand.

Innocent people will die – it's a shame it seems like it has to be this way.

It's flawed logic to believe that people must die to end a situation or conflict. Israel would prefer to work things out in another way.

But enough innocent civilians have been killed. Israel has made the decision to seek out those responsible for the terrorist attacks on its people. It sounds cold and callous, but they're taking care of their own first. They see no alternative to it – realistically, every reasonable chance of peaceful negotiation between Israel and Palestine has been destroyed by the attacks on Israel and Israel's angry return attacks on Palestine.

Israel, for right or wrong, has broken a vicious cycle. Peace negotiation/cease-fire reached. Suicide bombing. Angry, violent Israeli reaction. Palestinian people crying out for the violence against their people.

So, this is what they're left with. It's a horrible decision to have to make – but to Israel, Israeli citizens come first.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

MASSPIRG hunger cleanup this weekend

Along with all of the sharp buddies UMass-Amherst is facing, homeless shelters nationwide are also experiencing the problem of paying the monies. Donations to homeless shelters over the last year have taken a steep decrease in order, though there has been a 10.00-25 percent toward assistance in helping those in need.

This finding stirs for the 18th annual hunger clean-up. MASSPIRGers have been finding homeless shelters offices to be emptying and moving to smaller digs. The phone numbers have been changed and the original addresses have been relocated.

Today, and this is a hunger cleanup. Not a hunger clean up as a matter of fact. Instead it is a service project. Volunteer students from the Five College area raise funds and gather this Saturday, April 6, at the Amherst Common for community service.

The money raised will go to the homeless shelters, women and children in Zimbabwe, and to a food salvage program at UMass. The event starts at 10 a.m. and ends at 3 p.m.

Students will meet at Amherst Common at 11 a.m. and form teams of about ten individuals. After orientation, students and community members will be assigned specific sites where they are to perform fun jobs such as painting, light construction, and gardening.

Free food and drinks will be provided to volunteers as a thank you for their hard day's work. Also, from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m., a local band will be playing free of charge (site still to be determined).

An estimated 400 students and community members from the Five College area are participating in the annual hunger cleanup. MASSPIRG needs the help of UMass students in order to bring awareness and money back to the homeless in America. If the hunger clean-up sounds like something you are interested in, please give MASSPIRG a call at 545-0199 or stop by our office at 425A Student Union.

Sincerely,

Michelle Johnson

I'm all done with this

Yes loyal readers, this will be my last installment in The Collegian because as of today I've quit. My reasons are many but the short version is that I am sick of all the b.s. that comes with putting my face out in public every week.

To the guy who left the threatening letter on my truck and slashed my tires: go to hell. Listen pal, if you had any sac at all, you would have tried to use that shank you used on my tires on me, let's go. For the guys calling and threatening my girlfriend, roommates and friends with violence, you have won. I am stopping this newspaper stuff so you will leave them alone.

Listen people. I have been shoving my face onto this page every week for the last four years. I would have liked to finish out the year by doing this stuff and leaving knowing I wrote my first column two weeks after arriving at school, and that I finished what I started. Now because of a group of cowardly idiots, it all has to stop.

I do not know who these people are but I obviously said something sometime to piss them off. They have slashed my tires, threatened me, left weird notes and pictures on my truck and mailed me things. I have my suspicions about who is doing this but I have no evidence to prove it, so my only recourse is to leave the paper for the safety of my friends and family.

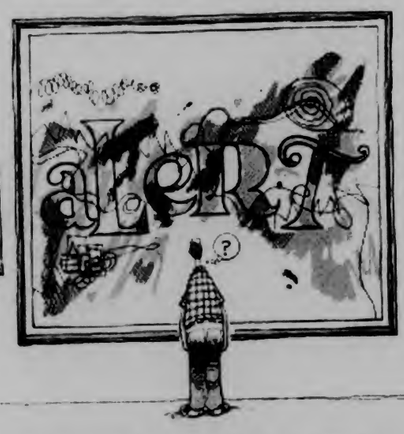
"I don't want to find anymore dead animals left on my front steps. The blood is too hard to clean up."

I don't want to find any more dead animals left on my front steps. The blood is too hard to clean up.

To all the people at The Collegian, I say thanks. Matt Despres, the guy who is in charge of the Ed/Op page, is one of the nicest guys you will ever meet, even though he tends not to shave on a regular schedule and at last count he owned every Air Supply album ever produced. Dan Lamothe is also a guy I have to thank. He is Matt's assistant with the page and a guy who always produces great material. The only thing about Lamothe is that he is always dressed up and looking "professional," whatever the hell good that is.

Sam Wilkinson is also a guy that has to be thanked, even though he should be the one getting threatened. Have you seen the stuff that guy writes? Holy schmoly!

To the gang of miscreants who are trying to make my life a living hell, this is it. You have said many times if I stop writing you will stop with the harassment tactics and leave my friends and I alone. You have won. Everyone has tired under the strain of stress and the thoughts of being cornered alone by one of you thugs. So help me God if I ever find out who you are...



To the readers, I am sorry to be bailing out on you early this year.

Even though some of you obviously hate me and wish me ill, I hope the majority of people think the opposite. I have felt a sense of duty and pride in serving you up a column every week. Even when I have been skewered in the court of public opinion I've been back the next week. Sadly, this is it.

The only thing I can so is to ask you to keep your ears to the pavement and if you hear anything at all about the people who have made me and my roommates live under a cloud of fear and physical violence for the last months, please report it to the proper authorities.

Good luck, good health, and Godspeed to all. Especially the people who read this column all the way down and thought it was for real... sucker.

The great Skittle mystery

Hi. How was your Easter? Good. Did you have a nice weekend? Was the Easter Bunny good to you? He wasn't?! Maybe that's because you were bad and don't deserve live-stock-shaped marshmallows covered in various colors of sugar.

All right, people. I only have two months of these precious columns left, so I've decided that from here on out I'm going to stop talking about real world issues, that you and I both know I really don't have a grasp on, and focus on being a "fluff" columnist. And by "fluff" I don't mean that goopy white substance that goes great with peanut butter and keeps for years. Rather, I'm just going to run my mouth about various topics and you can take it or leave it.

I've come to this conclusion, not only because I have absolutely no ideas this week, but because I find that when I talk about stuff that I feel is important, no one gives a rat's patoot, and when I write about foolishness everyone appreciates. So I pledge to thee, dear reader, a new, improved, fun column that neglects argumentative current topics like Catholicism, peace in the Middle East, terrorism or Mitt Romney's views on abortion. From now on it's keg stands, spring break stories and Greg the Bunny. I'm making a pledge to stop wasting my time trying to inform you while practicing journalistic integrity. From here on out I'm all Dave Barry, all the time.

So let's start the new and improved "fun" column this week and talk about the Skittles (Skittles is a registered trademark of the Mars Candy Co., whose permission I could not obtain) advertising campaign. Everybody cares about candy, right? I sure do. It's definitely one of the most important elements of my diet and being that all pastel and other spring-themed candy is on sale at the local markets this week, let's take a moment to focus on Skittles and discuss my confusion as to what "tasting the rainbow" actually means.

Now, when I was a young girl there was one kind of Skittles. Your basic Skittle bag is about the size of your average M&M or Raisinets bag and I'll refrain from relating Raisinets to rabbit pellets because... never mind, I just did).

So, yeah one sized bag and your primary colored Skittles, being (for those who didn't graduate kindergarten) red, yellow and blue along with green and purple. On the bag there was a rainbow, indicating not only the variety of colors and flavors, but also that the candy welcomed non-traditional sexual orientations to enjoy it too. At Halloween time they sell the "fun-size" bags of Skittles. Those were undoubtedly fun, and that was that. Simple. One bag. One rainbow. I understood Skittles and the aim of Skittles to be a tasty, fruit juicy candy.

Now, in the new millennia the Mars Candy Company has delivered unto the Skittles consumer an enigmatic and disturbing advertising campaign that, quite frankly, scares the bejesus out of me.

You've seen the commercials. Sometimes, they involve animals. Sometimes, they involve oddly dressed individuals and fairies and waterfalls. They all take place in this strange medieval forestland where there is no sun, only cloudiness and, of course, rainbows. The characters are usually oddly dressed and in one there's a well-built young man, naked from the waist up surrounded by what look to be wood sprites.

This weird commercial reminds me of the Stone Temple Pilots' "Sour Girl" video, with Buffy and the Teletubbie-like creatures which, in turn, reminds me of how much their last album sucked and therefore cause me to relate Skittles to the continual suckage of the music industry which depresses me and makes me want to buy chocolate (which I guess, also works to their advantage). First there's weird music, then the sky brightens, then the rainbow appears and the candy falls in this strange land. Finally, a strange, disembodied voice commands me to "Taste the Rainbow."

I stop what I'm doing and run to Dairy Mart to buy a bag of Sour Skittles. Often, I don't even remember the drive there. And when I return home the bag is eaten and I am left with a numb mouth, that doesn't taste anything like a rainbow. I return home, sit in front of the television and wait for the puzzling message and images to come on again, and the cycle continues.

That's not really true. Sometimes I have to buy the original red bag because others, also touched by the ad, beat me to the punch and buy up all the sour ones.

What I'm trying to prove here, is that companies are trying to brain wash us by sending cryptic messages through that glowing box which we worship daily and nightly. I am growing nauseated by what the advertising executives think will get through to me. And, contrary to my make-believe Mars Candy Company brainwashing yarn, the advertisements aren't having any effect at all because they keep developing crappy new versions of the Skittle, like the mint Skittle.

Am I supposed to believe that a mint Skittle is going to make my breath fresher? Am I supposed to think that a mint Skittle or a Mittle (as I call it) is going to refresh me the way an Altoid or a 'Smint would? Ha, the joke's on you, Mars Candy Company. You can't impress us with weird commercials. Personally, as an Irish-American dwarf I'm deeply offended by the rainbow which references Leprechauns. I beg you, until they start producing commercials that make sense, please refrain from the purchasing of the Skittle.

Internet Hook-ups

Ask Elena

By Elena Panesis
Collegian Staff

Hey Elena, have you ever been on a blind date? Actually not just any blind date... Have you ever met up with someone that you started talking to through instant messenger? I have been talking to this guy now for about three months and he wants to meet up for coffee. He seems like the perfect man from his picture, profile and the conversations that we've had. Would I be fool to go on a date with him? – Brenda T.

Well, Brenda, I try to help rather than judge my readers so I would never call a wise woman, who happened to compose a very pertinent question, a fool! Since the rise of the Internet with its chat rooms and instant messages, many individuals have found themselves in your predicament.

With just a few keywords like female and UMass, you can browse the profiles on the AOL member directory of sexy and smart sweeties located right on our campus. What guy could resist a fiery red-head with ocean blue eyes that supposedly dances professionally during the week but also enjoys hanging out at the ballpark with the boys on the weekends for some beer and hot dogs?

Remember to insert the word "supposedly" in all dialogue concerning the idle chatter of the Internet. I love when people instant message me with the oh so clever A/S/L (age/sex/location for the non-internet users. Do you still exist?). My all time favorite came from someone named Bball69 or something like that, who really made my heart sing with, "35 year old Revere man here that loves water sports! Wanna play?"

Let's just say that I didn't meet Bball poolside at the Revere Y for an exhilarating afternoon of water polo, volleyball and an X-rated version of Marco Polo. Instead I blocked him from my buddy list and ignored his remarkably stunning picture that resembled a young Sylvester Stallone in his "Rocky" days.

Basically, you have no idea if this dream guy is for real, even if you have been chatting with him for months. It's quite easy to fabricate appearances over the Internet through delicious descriptions like "a six-pack of abs and an adorable smile that puts Brad Pitt to shame." Perhaps, that six-pack is really Coors Light and it currently resides in his gut rather than abs? Moreover, obtaining a picture is a snap with websites like www.amihotornot.com and online personals. Any savvy Internet user knows how to copy and paste a pic and package it as his/her own especially since the photos are usually taken by an amateur photographer adding to the "realism."

In fact, anyone can craft their own identity on www.aol.com by creating a screen name, copying a picture and picking a name and location. For all I know, Bball could have been a sixty- year old woman from Detroit that one day got bored with her Harlequin novels!

Yet, I would never suggest bar-

Spring Break – it's an age old booty shakin', bikini wearin', beer chuggin' tradition. Fun? Yes. Classy? Hells no. For most, it's a week of debauchery and scandals – but for one girl (and if you didn't catch that, that would be this girl right here), it was a week of investigative fashion journalism. That's right, the truth comes out.

The anatomy of a wet T-shirt contest – No night at the clubs would be complete with out a little misogyny and skankiness rolled into some good wet T-shirt fun. Participants in wet T-shirt contests require some serious fashion skills, in the loosest sense. (Pun FULLY intended.) The lovely "ladies" (and by lady, I mean member of the Future Strippers of America Club) must show their tailoring skills by taking a white T-shirt and cutting/tying it as small as humanly possible. No worries how resilient the design is, for the T-shirt is soon flung into the hordes of waiting males chanting "Take it off" – except in far more vulgar terms. Soon, pants come off, and you've got thirteen naked-except-for-a-thong girls who will horrify their 14-year-old brothers when

Comic Book Flicks

By Christopher Kenny
Collegian Staff

When the dinosaurs were wiped from the face of the Earth, the cause could be determined fairly concisely. It is clear that a cataclysmic asteroid smashed into the planet, blotting out the sun and destroying the precious resources that the giant animals depended on. Likewise, a unique species called the comic book movie nearly became extinct by a bomb of a similar nature; its name was Batman and Robin, by far one of the most inept and embarrassing comic book movies ever made. This movie, which managed to destroy just about any credibility the comic book industry had as source material for film, wrongly sent a signal that comic book movies as a fad were over.

But this brand of movie was granted a reprieve when X-Men, directed by Bryan Singer (Usual Suspects, Apt Pupil) and Ghost World, directed by Terry Zwigoff (Crumb), were released. These movies proved that you could take the source material seriously, refraining from the excessive camp of the last two Batman movies, and put out a strong, exciting movie that can appeal to the non-comic reading audience.

Unfortunately, Marvel Comics, who publishes the X-Men books, was not prepared for the release of its movie. Rather than making it an opportunity to introduce the comics to an audience to Professor X and his band of merry mutants, it continued to churn out stories mired in years of continuity, where even the most learned fan needed a road map in order to follow it. Like the most convoluted soap opera – which is what comics really are when it boils right down to it – the books were too dense and incomprehensible to the reader.

This wasn't the first time Marvel missed the chance to promote their characters. Blade – a minor Marvel character from the 70s who looked more like Tito Jackson than Wesley Snipes – came to the big screen with surprising success. However, the higher-ups at Marvel were so out-to-lunch that they didn't even arrange to have their company's name prominently shown on the movie ads. Worse yet, they didn't even have a comic book featuring Blade to coincide with the release of the movie. Ask any fan of the Blade movie and chances are they didn't even realize he was initially a comic book character. Marvel failed to capitalize on a successful movie and had no product ready to push.

The new management at Marvel, headed by Editor-In-Chief Joe Quesada, learned from these mistakes and they are soon going to have an opportunity to do it right. Blade II, directed by Guillermo del Toro (Mimic), is the first of many Marvel characters to be featured in the movie theaters. In early May, the long-awaited Spider-Man, directed by Sam Raimi (Evil Dead trilogy, A Simple Plan) and starring Tobey Maguire, will be arriving to rabid fans who have very high expectations. Daredevil stars Ben Affleck as the blind lawyer who fights crime in Hell's Kitchen, and is being directed by Mark Steven Johnson (Grumpy Old Men, Simon Birch). It started filming March 20th with a script that has a great amount of buzz surrounding it. Last, but certainly not least, is Universal Studios' The Hulk, which is directed by Ang Lee (Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon) and starring Eric Bana (Chopper, Black Hawk Down) and Jennifer Connelly (A Beautiful Mind).

Blade is not the only movie to become a franchise. X-Men II is showing serious movement, with the director and many of the cast members of the original returning. And Marvel has even made its books more accessible to fans of the movie, even giving the X-Men black leather similar to the film's wardrobe. Though Spider-Man has not been released yet, Sony Pictures is so sure of its success that a sequel is already in the planning stages, with Sam Raimi returning to direct.

Marvel isn't going to be caught sleeping at the wheel again. Now they have a variety of special projects coming out to get fans of the movies into the comics. Blade's own ongoing series just debuted this month; in order to reflect the intensity of the movie, the comic is going to be a mature audience comic under the MAX imprint. Spider-Man has three very reader-friendly series – Ultimate Spider-Man, Peter Parker: Spider-Man, and Amazing Spider-Man – plus a comic that has a rotating creative team and focuses on how Spider-Man effects periphery characters in indirect and sometimes direct ways, entitled Tangled Web. Ultimate Spider-Man will have a special double-sized story featuring the return of the nemesis featured in the film, the Green Goblin. There will also be a movie adaptation of both Blade II and Spider-Man.

Marvel isn't the only one with big plans for the big screen. Rumors abound on multiple DC film projects involving Superman and Batman. There is even talk of a movie featuring both of them teaming up, with Wolfgang Petersen (Das Boot, Air Force One) attached to direct. McG, who directed Charlie's Angels, is attached to direct Superman in his own feature film while director Darren Aronofsky (Requiem For a Dream) is developing on a script with comic book writer Frank Miller on Miller's classic Batman: Year One comic book, which showcased a younger Bruce

Del Toro brings the horror

THE DEVIL'S BACKBONE
Directed by Guillermo Del Toro
Starring Marisa Paredes and Fernando Tielve
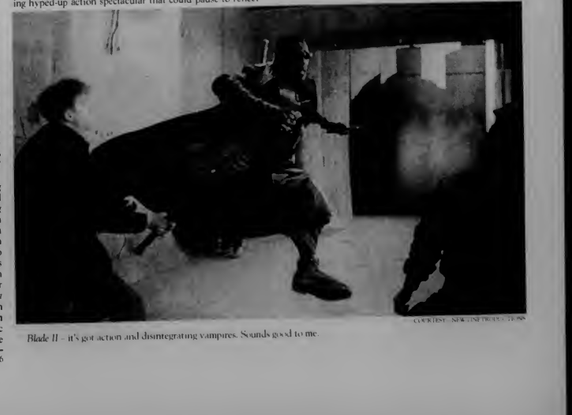
(In Spanish with English Subtitles)



It's been a good long while since the horror genre had a director it could also call an auteur. Not since the heyday of Wes Craven and John Carpenter has there been someone whose name was synonymous with the field. So that means the young Spanish director Guillermo Del Toro is primed to be the first horror visionary of the 21st century. Del Toro made his entrance with the cult Spanish scare flick Cronos and then made the jump to Hollywood with the fabulously creepy, darkly beautiful and vastly underrated big-bug thriller Mimic and now has two new films showing in area theaters, the Spanish-language ghost story The Devil's Backbone and the vampire sequel Blade 2.

Anyone with a healthy aversion to blood and goo might want to stay away from Blade 2. Del Toro has an avid love for things that go squish in the night: vampires disintegrate into Halloween-colored blasts of spark and ash, blood sprays across walls like a Jackson Pollock painting, and slimy viscera glisten during an autopsy sequence. If nothing else, Del Toro exists to give makeup effects men work.

The original Blade was a farrago of action, horror, martial arts and stylized comic book imagery. On a recent viewing, I remembered how visually imaginative it was, but also I remembered how mournful it is: a splattery, glittering hyped-up action spectacular that could pause to reflect on the fates of its characters. Blade 2 is a proud sequel, though Del Toro has his own fashion sense. The first movie was inspired by equal parts techno, MTV, comic books, Hong Kong and anime; the new version is more gothic, more horror, but it isn't a somber mess like Queen of the Damned. The movie picks up where the original left off, with the half-breed vampire hunter Blade (Wesley Snipes) hunting down bloodsuckers and searching for his mentor Whistler (a craggier-than-ever Kris Kristofferson) who was supposedly killed. After finding Whistler in a tank of blood, kept alive to be a play thing for the vamps, Blade is approached by two of his enemies (after a rather terrific, jittery fight scene) who offer a truce: they will call off their war on Blade if he joins in an uneasy alliance to help them, over the years, it's a disquieting effect. The fight scenes are deftly staged, with none of the heavy-handed, "kick-pow-thud" leadenness of the past few let li movies. Del Toro's camera twirls along with the action, and the CG effects used to supplement the razory, acrobatic moves give the feeling of otherworldly forces converging on each for battle. But the Blade movies would only be shiny, but hollow, FX vessels if there wasn't something beneath the skin.

Snipes excels at showing his hero's vulnerable side under the mask of snarling stoicism, subtly conveying Blade's conflict between his two natures (it's also a looser they pick up their copy of Girls Gone Wild XXV next fall.

The wrap – Yes, every girl on the beach shows up the first day with a pair of shorts pulled over her bikini bottoms. But by day three, she will undoubtedly be wearing a sarong or wrap – most often of the batik floral persuasion. Not only does it give your appearance that sassy tropical look, but it also gets the hoards of women who roam the sand saying "Pretty lady, come look at my wraps." off your back.

The Speedo – One would think that with throngs of college students roaming Mexico, Florida and the Caribbean, not a thong would be seen in the lot. Unfortunately, those who think that forgot about a little place called Europe – where the rule apparently is the hairier the man, the smaller and more neon the Speedo. They're old, they're chunky and they've got no right rockin' spring break – but rock spring break they do, with their pseudo-man 1/2 bikinis in offensively bright yellows and oranges with coordinating fanny packs. Grrrrrrr, hats. Very grrrrrrr.

Tube Tops – Everyone at UMass knows that frat boys LOVE the Mardi Gras parties. Well so do Spring Breakers – perhaps it lends a touch of the Staties and fond memories of "Skooz" the sixth-year senior at Lamda Kappa Chi. Nothin' cures a little homesickness like a trashed sophomore from Kansas State trippin' on 1 and yellin' "Show your ____." (Fill in word of your choice – It's like Mad Libs, but with only one correct answer.) Yes, at least two out of every three Spring Break parties are Mardi Gras bashes with competitions for who can get the most beads. Naturally, the fashion choice for such nights is a tube top for easy (pun intended AG-MN) chest access. Make sure to pack several for next year's trip.

Braids – Yes, this is the ultimate in Spring Break fashion. It's like a right of passage, that all girls MUST get braids while on Spring Break. And she who is able to leave them in the longest amount of time wins. Whether it's half a head of cornrows or a few select braids here and there, there's no better way to feel tropical and to TOTALLY mark yourself as a tourist, as getting' da braids. Sarcasm aside, the braids actually look quite adorable and serve the function of keeping hair neat and orderly in hot and humid weather. Sarcasm back in full effect, the braids also serve the purpose of screaming out "I've been on Break!" This is especially useful for Irish and/or Albino girls who were unable to get that sun-kissed tan to prove they've gone tropical.

Spring Breaks have a look all their own – braids, sunburns and boots, but don't look for this trend coming to a Gucci runway near you anytime soon.

M2M - refreshingly different teens

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

M2M
The Big Room
Atlantic

M2M were some of the first of the teen pop wave to write their own lyrics and play their own instruments.

I never thought teen pop got the respect it deserved. Now, I'm not some big teenybopper freak, but I like all kinds of music, including bubblegum, and always considered it a genre on par with all others. So, I was always upset when people would dismiss it outright, sniggering about how the bubble was going to burst (and about things even cracker). Like rock music, or hip-hop, or country, or techno, teen-pop music has its hills and valleys. There would be bad artists that go forgotten (too many lame boy bands to count), bad artists who are inexplicably given radio success (Willa Ford, O-Town), and artists that were hit and miss, like 'NSync and the Backstreet Boys (two bands that have crafted some killer pop songs, like "Pop" and "I Want It That Way," respectively, but have also created disasters lie BSB's slurpy "Drowning.") And then there are the good artists who achieve much success (like Mandy Moore) and the good ones who get tossed to the wayside, like M2M.

When teen pop was at its peak a couple of years ago, one of the best acts in the canon was the Swedish duo of Marit Larsen and Marion Raven, also known as M2M. They even had a couple of minor, Disney channel hits – "Mirror, Mirror" and "Don't Say You Love Me," featured on the soundtrack to the first Pokemon movie. What set the girls apart from the Britneys and Christinas, was the fact Larsen and Raven, only about 15-years-old each, had autonomy over their music, writing their own songs and playing their own instruments. Yes, instruments. While all the other bubblegum acts relied on syncopated electronic beats produced in the studio, the girls used acoustic guitars and piano to craft airy, honey sweet pop music morsels.

Three years after their debut Shades of Purple, the M2M girls find themselves in an environment hostile to teen acts, in which the bubblegum artists are scrambling to prove their identities and become the next Beatles or Madonna, rather than the next Color Me Badd or Tiffany. Larsen and Raven also find themselves one step behind, as what made them different – the self-songwriting, the organic use of live instruments – has been co-opted. Now Britney and Justin are writing their own songs, and a new legion of teenage girls (and guys; remember BBMak and Evan and Jaron) armed with instruments – like Vanessa Carlton and her piano, or Michelle Branch with her guitar – are ruling the airwaves. Now, instead of being ahead of the pack, M2M is at one with the pack.

Happily, that loss of what made them original hasn't resulted in the bogging down of their music. Their new CD The Big Room is a crystalline example of the heights that teen pop can accomplish when given the chance to break free of the computer. At its best, The Big Room recalls the greatest songs that the Hanson brothers ever put out (like the wonderful "If Only"); at its worst, the album includes mildly disappointing tracks that don't go anywhere. Released on March 5 with little buzz, I doubt this will really sell. But it should.

The girls' voices are wisps and light, lacking in any venom or urgency. This is a problem on their more ballad-like songs, where their small voices fail to carry the songs to stratospheric heights. Some less then big voiced singers can sometimes do this, however, like when Natalie Imbruglia belts out with pouty vocals on the great, anthemic "Do You Love" on her new White Lilies Island album.) But they work well on the more upbeat, poppier numbers. The Big Room is bouncy and energetic, and bubbles along quickly, lasting less then forty minutes. The best songs are upfront – "Everything," "Jennifer," "Don't," "Psychonc" – but that hardly means the remainder of the album is a washout. Even at its weakest, The Big Room is fairly strong. The girls and producer Jimmy Bralower are smart enough to tinge the music with elements beyond strumming acoustic guitars - there are twinkling pianos here and there, and the occasional wailing electric guitars to give the songs some backbone.

The girls are still teens and the lyrics don't go beyond anything but amore. And so what? Who says every song should have some meaning to it? Some of the best songs are only about love. Besides, the girls are only about 17 or 18 years old, and no one at that age should have more or less then a rudimentary ideology. So, the girls should just sit back and sing about what the know. Anyone that age who pretenes they are Bob Dylan are posturing fool. Wait a couple of years before tackling the big issues.

ring yourself from all Internet conversations, especially if this guy sounds like a cross between Ben Affleck and Heath Ledger. Despite all the horrific stories of Internet meetings – especially among young teens, it is not unheard of finding a genuinely nice person on the net. I have heard plenty of stories of cyber-love turned to real life love, and no, I am not just referring to the flick You've Got Mail.

If you really want to meet this guy and his intentions are real, ask him to go out for a group gathering at a public place during the day. Bring a few of your friends making sure that at least one is a guy that can kick some booty, and invite him out to lunch or coffee. So if this local guy is really a fourteen-year old Brit from London, then he more than likely won't show up unless Mum and Dad own a private jet.

Also, it will relieve you of unnecessary pressure since first dates always cause a few jitters. If you bring people you trust and keep it casual, then you will get a chance to get a real face to face impression of this guy. Then you can decide for yourself if you trust and like him enough to meet for a one-on-one encounter later in the game.

So play it safe but have some fun! Who knows; perhaps this modest man has been downplaying his appearance by holding back his modeling pictures from a photo shoot on a Bahamian beach for fear of looking too pompous. I'll keep my fingers crossed for you! Good luck!

performance than in the first one, maybe because their isn't as much exposition). The conflict is demonstrated in Blade's growing attraction and love for the shapely vampire Nyssa, played by Leonor Varela, who is able to show that Nyssa is not evil or villainous at all. (In one quiet moment with Blade, she tells that she was "born a vampire", and gets us to think: does that make her a bad character.) Kristofferson and Norman Reedus, as Whistler's pothead techie replacement give the movie an air of what-the-hell informality. Blade 2 is far superior to many of the horror movies that have been released recently (especially vamp movies like Queen of the Damned, The Forsaken and Dracula 2000), but it has one tiny flaw: some of the storyline is weirdly similar to that of the underwhelming zombie attack opus Resident Evil.

The Devil's Backbone is a spare and elegant supernatural thriller a la The Sixth Sense and The Others. On the eve of Franco's taking of Spain, young Carlos (Fernando Tielve) is sent to live in an orphanage in the dusty dry lands. Though the principal (Marisa Paredes) and the doctor (Frederico Luppi) who run it are nice, it isn't a welcoming place for young boys, a fascist - unexploded air bomb sits in the middle of the courtyard, the caretaker (Eduardo Noriega) is an abusive, murderous SOB, and the other boys whisper about "the one who sighs," a ghostly child who roams the halls at night. The ghost, belonging to that of a dead boy named Santi, is a creation of pure, wrenching creepiness. When fully glimpsed, he has porcelain pale skin and a spider web crack in his head from which a stream of watery blood floats upward. Del Toro is nothing if not a creator of marvelously scary walking nightmares. The movie is thick with atmosphere and dread, which is something that too few recent "ghost stories" know how to accomplish. Del Toro also expounds on themes of lost innocence and countries devouring themselves in civil war with metaphors that are heart wrenching, but not forced (the last shot is particularly heartbreaking). The whole recent "quiet horror" thing, to me, always felt like a gimmick to capitalize on a phenomenon, which is why we get movies like the empty What Lies Beneath or the wretchedly inept Soul Survivors. Even The Others, with its handsome spookiness, was tainted by a freeze-dried predictability. The Devil's Backbone is the real thing, a spooky, noose-tightening chiller that has you squirming in your seat. Now if Del Toro only taught his peers to make horror movies this good...

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's lacrosse

University of Massachusetts junior midfielder Chris Fiore (Freeport, N.Y.) earned ECAC Offensive Player of the Week honors following the Minutemen's 13-12 come-from-behind victory over No. 18 Penn State in men's lacrosse action last Saturday.

Fiore scored a career-high five goals as Massachusetts defeated Penn State, 13-12, and improved to 2-0 in the ECAC Lacrosse League. Fiore scored the Minutemen's first goal of the game and then scored an important goal with just one second left in the first half to cut the Nittany Lion lead to 8-5. He completed the hat trick in the third quarter and netted his fourth goal at the beginning of the final quarter. Fiore tied the game, 12-12, with 49 seconds left in regulation for his fifth goal of the game.

Fiore's previous single-game high was three goals, which he did against Brown and against Hartford earlier this season. He entered the year with 14 goals and nine assists in 23 career games. Through eight games in 2002, he has scored 17 goals and four assists. He is tied for second on the team in goals and is fourth in scoring. Fiore has scored 13 goals and three assists in the last four games.

Massachusetts is 7-1 overall and 2-0 in the ECAC this season. The Minutemen are currently ranked No. 9 in the latest national poll and have won seven straight games since dropping the season-opener to Hofstra. Massachusetts returns to action with a home game against ECAC rival UMBC on Saturday at 1:00 p.m.

Women's Water Polo

Senior Megan Perry (Fresno, Calif.) was named the Collegiate Water Polo Associations northern division player of the week as announced by the league for her performance on the Minutewomen's final leg of their spring break trip in California.

Perry scored four goals and dished out three assists as the Minutewomen downed Claremont Mudd-Scripps, 11-9, and fell to then 20th-ranked Cal Baptist, 11-6. She recorded a hat trick and two assists against Claremont, then followed it up with a goal and an assist against Cal Baptist. The senior also had three steals in the two games.

After a rare mid-season week off, Massachusetts will compete in a league tournament April 6 in Providence, R.I. UMass will play Harvard at 12:00 p.m., No. 17 Brown at 4:30 p.m., and Connecticut College at 7:30 p.m.

Junior Lydia Robinson led the way with a career-high five goals in the game, including four goals in the second half.

Without the responsibility of draw controls, Emery stepped up on the offensive end for the first time all season long as well.

She scored four goals in the second frame, including the game-tying score with 22 minutes left in the game.

"I was kind of working on the details," the junior midfielder said. "I haven't been playing up to my ability lately."

"Jada [Emery] was really important in the midfield today," Barnes said. "With loose balls she was everywhere and that helped set the tone."

Emery scored the last goal for UMass with four minutes remaining in the contest, giving UMass a 16-11 lead in the game.

The Dukes put on a last-minute rush where they scored two goals in 30 seconds, but it was too little, too late. The Minutewomen finished off their impressive come-from-behind effort and won 16-13.

Emery summed it up best when she said, "Today our team focused in on how to play as a team, not as individuals, and that's why we came away with a win."

Saturday's game was marked by an inability for either team to get anyone out, as the fourth inning was the only one in which neither squad scored. For UMass, Morgan was the hitting star, lining an opposite field homer to left in the first and bombing a blast over the right field fence in the fifth.

However, the screws came loose in the top of the seventh, as a 6-4 Maroon and White advantage quickly turned into a 12-6 deficit.

The inning began when starter Eric Chown (0-4 on the season) loaded the bases with nobody out and was pulled in favor of Matt Boulanger. However, the junior from Westfield, Mass. did not last long, as he was also pulled after allowing back-to-back doubles to Jake Wald (3-for-5, four RBIs) and Krimmel (2-for-3), and then promptly walking the next two batters.

Brian Hourigan could also do nothing to slow the onslaught, as a walk and a single gave the Colonials seven runs in the inning without having recorded an out.

UMass would rally in the seventh, eighth and ninth (loading the bases in each inning), but it could never regain the lead it lost in the top of the seventh.

"We need to play with more intensity and pitch tougher," Stone said. "We are certainly executing offensively, but we have to get some people to get people out."

The day sport died at Bowling Green

Another school feels budget cut wrath

By Paul Shugar
THE POST (OHIO U.)

(U-WIRE) ATHENS, Ohio – Show me the money.

It might be a cliche, but at Bowling Green several athletes are learning the phrase's meaning. The Bowling Green athletic department announced last week the school is cutting men's tennis, track and swimming and diving in response to a $3.4 million debt.

"I am very saddened, and it hurt a lot," Bowling Green Director of Compliance Sid Sink said. "It was very tough on me and hard to deal with, knowing my university that I ran for in the late '60s and early '70s, coached at and now work for, was dropping my old sport."

Cutting the three sports and 16 scholarships affects about 55 athletes at Bowling Green. Track coach Sterling Martin and tennis coach Jay Harris will be let go at the end of this year. The cuts allow the school to save $360,000.

Associate Athletic Director and Senior Women's Administrator Janna Blais said remaining student athletes will be allowed to stay on scholarship or transfer without sitting out a year.

Blais said the debt has piled up on the athletic department. She also said sports were cut because of financial concerns, not Title IX. Men's sports caught most of the brunt because Bowling Green had to comply with Title IX rules.

"Title IX came in to play to figure out what sports we have to drop. The main basis was financial for the university," she said. "It is definitely very hard to run 11 men's and 11 women's sports because we have to put so many to counteract what we spend on the men, and ice hockey is very expensive."

Bowling Green is one of 13 schools with Division I hockey, basketball and football.

Sink said Bowling Green did not want to part with hockey because of its popularity among students and alumni. The hockey team also won the NCAA national championship in 1984, and a new $700,000 renovation to the Bowling Green Ice Arena was completed this year.

Despite the choice to preserve hockey, Bowling Green's men's track team is lost. Track coach Sterling Martin and tennis coach Jay Harris will be let go at the end of this year. The cuts allow the school to save $360,000.

"We looked at the regional and national health of the sport, and that came into play with tennis with where we stand in country," she said. "Only six schools in the MAC have tennis and it will be five after we leave, so it is not a sport that flourished in our area for a lot of reasons.

"Our men's swimming team has struggled, but that has nothing to do with it. Student athletes and coaching staff know we can't get any more money, and with what we can give we will probably be setting them up for failure because it makes it hard to be competitive."

"A black day for the MAC is what they did," Ohio track coach Elmore Banton said. "Bowling Green (track) is a good program with a lot of history and prestige, so it is a shame it was eliminated."

While the men's swimming and diving struggled, the men's tennis team had success with 11 all-conference players in the last four seasons. Blais said many factors were examined before deciding which sports to cut.

Welcome back, UMass

Softball sweeps LaSalle easily in return home

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With spring finally in the air in the Pioneer Valley, the Massachusetts softball team was able to ring in the new season with its first home action of the season.

Pity the LaSalle Explorers for having to be the victims of the hungry, homesick Minutewomen.

After a perfect 18-0 at the Softball Complex in 2001, the Maroon and White continued that trend in dominating fashion, reeling off three shutouts over the weekend to run its record to 21-10, 6-0 in Atlantic 10 play. Captain Kaila Holtz opened the doubleheader on Saturday with an 8-0 blanking, while Jen Hadley prolonged the Explorers' misery with a 9-0 pasting in Saturday's nightcap. Holtz finished off the visitors on Sunday afternoon with a 3-0 shutout.

"We've been anticipating being at home, playing in front of the home crowd for a while now," third baseman Scooter Wheeler said. "Just to be here with an extremely large crowd for our home opener was just awesome."

Wheeler led the offensive charge on Sunday, driving in all three Minutewoman runs on the day, including a two-run shot over the right field fence in the fifth inning. The blast gave UMass added insurance to its lead, but Holtz needed little run support as she cruised through the LaSalle batting order, striking out seven hapless Explorer hitters.

"I thought she threw a lot of good pitches, and I thought she moved the ball around," said coach Elaine Sortino of her junior hurler. "I don't think she gave up any well-hit balls all weekend, because she hit her spots pretty well." Holtz allowed a mere five hits while striking out 12 in her 13 innings in two games of shutout ball.

Sunday's contest was scoreless until the third inning, when Wheeler provided all the offense the Minutewomen would need. The senior whacked a two-out single off the glove of LaSalle's lunging second baseman to plate Emily Robustelli. But the Maroon and White were unable to produce any more dents in the score column, aside from Wheeler's RBI single and home run.

"We probably through the first four innings found ourselves in a little bit more of a game than we expected, based on [Saturday]," Sortino said. "You can't make any foregone conclusions.

"We had [three hits in the first three innings], and then in the fifth we had five hits but only two runs on the board," she added. "I thought we got a little tight, and fell behind in the count with runners in scoring position."

Offensive production was quite abundant in Saturday's doubleheader, however, as the Minutewomen pounded out 17 runs en route to two mercy-rule victories. In the opener, UMass held a slim 1-0 lead entering the bottom of the fifth inning, garnering its lone run off of an RBI single from Brandi Cross.

However, the Maroon and White erupted like a house on fire in the fifth and sixth innings, scoring seven runs. Senior captain Teri Rooney broke open a close 2-0 affair by crushing a LaSalle offering deep into left center for a triple, plating three runs in the process. Cross added a sacrifice fly to stake the Minutewomen to a 5-0 lead.

Three more runs in the next frame gave UMass the victory in the opener, as Rooney smacked a two-RBI single and Wheeler followed with another hit to end the affair.

The second half of the double-dip saw Hadley toss a two-hitter, while walking zero Explorers in a dominating performance. The Minutewomen got on the board quickly and often in game two, touching home plate seven times by the end of the second inning. Freshman Denise Denis highlighted the offensive outburst with a two-run triple in the second.

With 28 games under its belt before it even staged a home contest, UMass undoubtedly looked forward to this game for weeks, and the anticipation played a role in such an impressive weekend.

"When we come out strong during our warm-ups and all pumped up, it just makes us flow through the game," Wheeler said.

"When you're in the hotel [on the road], you have to eat breakfast at Denny's, and go to the game in the tour bus," Holtz said. "It's just nice to be able to do your own thing, sleep in your own bed, go to your own training room.

"The whole atmosphere of being at home really contributed to our performance [this weekend]," she continued.

Emily Robustelli makes the run.

Kaila Holtz pitched shutouts in the both ends of UMass' three-game sweep of LaSalle last weekend at the Softball Complex.

Minutewomen regain composure

Women's lax comes back to drop Dukes

By Glen Sträub

Life has not been too good for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team lately.

After starting the season 5-0, it fell into a rut going 2-2 in its next four contests including a narrow victory over a lowly St. Bonaventure team. On top of their sub par performance of late, the ladies have been unable to play on their familiar home surface.

UMass	16
Duquesne	13

Totman Field – thanks in part to the rains New England weather Richard J. Garber Field is a spectacular complex – but there is no place like home.

Hoping to put all their worries behind them, the Minutewomen faced off with the Duquesne Dukes in a crucial Atlantic 10 match up on Friday.

On a beautiful sunny day at Garber Field, just when things looked as if they were not going to get any better for the Maroon and White, it overcame a four-goal halftime deficit and heroically defeated the Dukes, 16-13.

With the victory, the Minutewomen improve to 6-2 on the season and 3-0 in the A-10, while the Dukes drop to 2-4 overall and 0-1 in the conference.

"Today we had control of what we were doing and people were supporting each other," co-captain Jada Emery said. "We came out with an attitude."

In the first half, the Minutewomen showed few signs of any improvement from the previous four games as Duquesne amounted an 8-4 lead before the halftime buzzer.

After UMass junior midfielder Kelli Kurtz scored the first goal of the game two minutes into the contest, the Dukes went on a rampage – scoring the next six goals.

The Duquesne first half rally was capped off when Dukes midfielder Kristen Harner fired a shot past UMass goaltender Cyndi Doyle with less than a second left on the clock, giving the visitors a commanding four-goal lead at halftime.

"In the first half we got down a little bit, but we knew we're the more focused team," Emery said. "We wanted to go out there and play our hardest."

With such a poor offensive attack, UMass Head Coach Phil Barnes knew that he had to make the necessary adjustments to give his team a chance to win in the second half.

"We talked about how we had to keep attacking the goal cage and become a little more aggressive," he said.

The Minutewomen had trouble gaining possessions in the first half, so Barnes gave Kurtz the duties in the face-off rather than the familiar Emery.

"Our draw control was the main difference for us in the second half and that is because of Kurtz's aggressiveness and our team's prowess for the ball," he said.

Barnes' adjustment worked wonders for the Minutewomen as they gained possession of the ball and amazingly scored twelve goals in the second half.

Stone stunned over Minutemen's struggles

By Jesse Greenspan

After a spring break in which it went 1-8, the Massachusetts baseball team was hoping a return trip north would allow for a reversal of fortune.

However, thus far, the Minutemen have fared only marginally better against lesser competition, and stand at only 7-12 (1-5 A-10) after dropping two of three contests (4-5, 13-6, 15-9) to George Washington this past weekend.

G.W.	4	13	13
UMass	5	6	9

"I thought we would be better than the way we are now," said UMass Head Coach Mike Stone, after watching his team fall in Saturday's 15-9 slugfest. "There is no way I would have envisioned this at the beginning of the year."

Despite the Maroon and White's struggles, the weekend started out well for Stone's squad, as ace pitcher Jesse Santos went the distance in the first game of Friday's doubleheader.

The 5-foot-9 right-hander from Chelmsford, Mass. improved to 3-1 on the year after allowing only four runs in seven innings, while also striking out 10 Colonial hitters.

Santos would get just enough support from the UMass bats, as a homer from shortstop Mike Athas and a two-RBI single from catcher Chris Morgan in the second staked the Minutemen to a 3-1 lead.

"Offensively we make things happen, and that is not something I am worried about with this ballclub," Stone said.

In the top of the seventh, GW mounted one last gasp rally, but Matt Krimmel's towering homer would go for naught, as Santos K'd Mike Bassett and induced a Justin Orendurff fly-out to center to end the contest.

The second game of the doubleheader started out well again for the Maroon and White, as it took advantage of three George Washington errors in the first two innings to score three unearned runs.

Everything came crashing down in the top of the third, though, as GW notched five runs (including three home runs) off freshman starter Keith Doherty. This was just the beginning of UMass' inability to retire the Colonials with any kind of consistency, as they would go on to score 21 more runs in the next 13 innings.

"We have shown we are young and immature on the mound and we have a hard time getting people out," Stone said. "Santos gave us a good effort, but we put ourselves in situations where good hitters hurt us."

Still, the game remained relatively close until the sixth, when GW catcher Joe Michalski hit a grand slam to end any realistic chance of a Minuteman comeback.

Author Hoff Sommers takes on modern feminism

JAMES M. HATTEN/COLLEGIAN

Conservative feminist Christina Hoff Sommers lectured in the Campus Center about "The Death of the Feminist Movement."

By Jake Lilien
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Christina Hoff Sommers, author of Who Stole Feminism?, spoke yesterday in the Campus Center. In her lecture, titled "The Death of Modern Feminism," she accused the movement of betraying its original principle of equality between the sexes.

"I do consider myself a feminist," Hoff Sommers said. "But I came to believe in the course of teaching women's studies that this movement has been hijacked. Instead of representing women, the movement has driven them away. Fewer and few women identify as feminists. If you ask a group of young women how many of them are feminists, very few will say that they are. They associate feminism with male-bashing and victimology.

"In the seventies, the movement was about freedom," she continued. "But today, in many cases, it's the opposite. Feminists have become carried away with the worst kind of radical politics."

In the lecture, Sommers differentiated between "equity feminists" and "gender feminists." She placed herself in the leagues of equity feminists, and defined an equity feminist as one who supports equal rights for women. Gender feminists, she said, have driven away equity feminists by embracing "political correctness and man-hating."

"If you go to the typical women's studies program, the feminism you encounter is gender feminism," she said. "If you take women's studies classes, you're told of a conspiracy theory, called the 'sex-gender system,' in which oppression is systematic.

"I simply do not accept this idea that women are a subordinate class," she said. "American women have more opportunities than any other group of women in history...there are so many area where we have surpassed men. We have parity with men in undergraduate education, in business school, in law school, and in medical school. We live longer, and we're more likely to have medical care. Usually, these aren't the qualities that you find in an oppressed group.

"Women have so many opportunities with regard to choosing between work and family," she added. "Men seem to have one choice – they can work full-time, they can work full-time, or they can work full-time."

Sommers went on to accuse the "gender feminists" of intellectual dishonesty. She pointed out several instances in which statistics touted by prominent feminists were proven false. Among them was a claim by author Naomi Wolf, in her book The Beauty Myth that 150,000 women a year die of anorexia.

"Anorexia is a terrible disease," Sommers said, "but it doesn't cause 150,000 deaths. Someone read a brochure that referred to 150,000 cases of anorexia, and twisted it into 150,000 deaths. The National Center of Health Statistics figure is 52 deaths a year."

Other statistics that Sommers sought to debunk were a claim that rates of domestic violence go up on Super Bowl Sunday, and a figure frequently cited by Vagina Monologues author Eve Ensler that 30 percent of women admitted to emergency rooms are there because of domestic violence.

"The Centers for Disease Control and the Bureau of Justice did careful studies of emergency rooms," Sommers said, "and fewer than one percent of women were there for domestic violence. There were more women there because of attacks from animals than attacks from men.

"Of course," she joked, "some of them are male dogs, so there may be a gender issue."

She also attacked feminists for embracing Marxist economics, saying that studies had repeatedly shown that free-market economies were the most conducive to women's empowerment.

She concluded her speech with a statement about excessive "political correctness" on college campuses.

"There is no intellectual diversity on your campus," she said. "It's not just UMass, it's many college campuses. Even if you're a liberal, you have to know that you cannot be properly educated if you don't contend with opposition. I'm not saying that you should be arguing with every fringe, nee, wacko, Nazi out there, but you should have mainstream ideas on your campus. You tend not to hear the mainstream – you only tend to hear the liberal and the radical. We're now less intellectually diverse than ever before."

When Sommers finished speaking, the floor was opened to questions and comments from the audience.

Scott Morris, a sophomore Anthropology major, asked Sommers what she thought about the lack of liberal viewpoints expressed outside of universities.

"I really don't see radicals as having much of a voice overall," he said.

Sommers responded by acknowledging that many liberals felt silenced in the wake of September 11. She

Students, faculty meet chancellor candidate

By Kristin Shrewsbury

Chancellor candidate Elizabeth D. Capaldi visited the University of Massachusetts at Amherst yesterday afternoon.

Capaldi, the first of the three candidates to visit the University this week, discussed her hopes for UMass as well as answered questions in an open forum.

Members of the Student Government Association, faculty and students convened at the Mullin's Center to question Capaldi on budget cuts, academic programming and her views on how to improve campus life at UMass.

"It's been an interesting experience meeting everyone here, and I think this is a wonderful campus with a bright future," Capaldi said. "UMass has a great atmosphere and it is clear that people want to see it move forward and the first way to accomplish this is to have communication with every group on campus."

Capaldi discussed her battle with budget cuts at the University at Buffalo, where she is currently the Provost. Capaldi explained that she was faced a $12 million budget cut a year and a half ago, and that the school was able to overcome the deficit.

"I've been involved with budget problems while working in Buffalo, and we had a $12 million deficit and a hiring freeze, but we were able to work out a new budget system in a year and a half," Capaldi said. "It's important to have team spirit and realize that if one area works, we all do better because of it."

Students questioned Capaldi on her opinions of the Resident Advisors recent vote to unionize and how she would respond if chancellor. Currently, the administration is in the process of appeals over the decision, however, by law, the RA's

Police issue alert following an assault and battery

A student was accosted at Dickinson Dormitory on March 29 when she was pushed up against a wall near the residence hall. She returned to her dormitory at approximately 12:45 p.m. from Olympia drive when three men attempted to engage her in conversation.

She kept walking and one of the men allegedly pushed her up against a wall and held her there for approximately one minute until he was startled by the noise of a nearby car. The woman was not injured.

The description of the alleged assailant is a white male of medium build. The man was approximately 5 feet 7 inches in height with short brown hair; he had no facial hair or glasses and was wearing a mid-length black leather jacket and a blue baseball cap backwards.

There is no description of the other two people involved.

The University of Massachusetts Police Department would appreciate any information regarding this alleged assault and battery. Anyone with information can call the police detective bureau at 545-0893 or call the TIPS line at 577-8477.

Some safety tips from the UMPD to prevent such crimes as assault and battery include sticking to well lit paths, traveling in groups, knowing the locations of help phones, reporting suspicious persons or activities and calling 911 if there is an emergency.

There was also a report of suspicious person activity on the same night at 9:00 p.m. The caller to the police station reported hearing screams coming from a room on Fearing Street. The caller tried several times to get into the room but found it to be locked. The individual informed the police that he had a key to the room if they needed to get in. Officers arrived on the scene and talked to the parties involved.

Khach-ing attention in Amherst

Is new discount program all it promotes?

By S.J. Port COLLEGIAN STAFF

In these last few weeks of the semester, many of us have simply run out of money. Our funds have been drained so that, sadly enough, the ATM will not even give us our remaining change because ATMs do not spit out dollar bills! However, the need to feed, clothe and even entertain ourselves remains. To save money and enjoy the benefits of being college kids in a college town, there are several remaining options, one of them being the Khach Card. But is it worth the investment, or is it just another scam?

Begun by University of Massachusetts alumnus Michael Khachadoorian, the Khach Card is a discount card for students and other members of the Amherst community. The card has been mainly targeted at and bought by UMass and Amherst College students as well as members of the Amherst community.

The card costs $12 and comes with 40 coupons for various free things (food, tanning visits, flowers, body waxing and so on). In total, the coupons have an estimated value of over $200.

"For someone who is on the fence of whether to buy a Khach Card packet or not, all they have to do is use two or three coupons, and they make their money back! All the ongoing discounts are just added benefits to the first time freebies, which add up to well over $200," Khachadoorian said. "What some people don't realize is that all these coupons are good for free stuff. They can walk into Antonio's and give them a coupon for a free slice. Walk next door to Bananarama and redeem another coupon for a free frozen yogurt and a free cookie (Sugar Jones). Walk down Kellogg St. for a free yoga class, and then eat a free appetizer downstairs at New India Restaurant. There is so much variety, everyone can benefit."

In addition, the actual Khach Card (bright yellow and therefore easy to spot) is a discount card in and of itself, so that once one uses up all the coupons, he or she will still receive discounts of 10-50 percent at stores across Amherst.

"I am proud of the quality of businesses I have amassed on the Khach Card. I frequented most all of the places while I studied in Amherst for four years, so a lot of the owners knew me already," said Khachadorian, adding that he thinks "the best thing about Khach Card is that it supports all local Amherst area business. There are no chain stores, no huge superstores. I have chosen places like In Shape Nutrition over places like GNC... Il Pirata, The Harp, Rafters and The Pub, over many of the chain restaurants on Route 9. In my opinion, the local places are better – much more diverse and original. That's just what I go for, and I like helping out the little guys."

Khachadoorian graduated from UMass in 1999 with a BBA in marketing and a minor in art and sees his card as a way to help struggling students add something to their diet of regular dining commons food or a little bit of color to their skin if they can't get away for vacations. The coupons are also a way to bring vendors in town extra business.

Khachadoorian began his business a year ago after quitting a job at Boston radio station WZLX 100.7 to work independently. The discount card idea evolved from a high school project.

"During high school, I did this class project where we had to come up with a business plan. We chose to do a local discount card. I got half of the business on the card and sold 300 out of the total 500," Khachadoorian said. "It was always in the back of my mind to do something else like that, but something that works better, something that appeals to the consumer more helps the individual businesses better and something that can also be used by local fundraisers. Throughout my college career at UMass, I would constantly think of ideas for starting my own business. It would change week to week. Last year, when I was 19 and ready to make it, by jump and start a business, this just happened to be the latest idea."

In the past year, Khachadoorian has successfully established his Khach Card in over 15 towns in Amherst and in his hometown of Wakefield, Mass.

When the card first appeared in May of 2001, only 17 stores had bought into Khachadoorian's idea. This semester's card promotes 80 stores. Each semester, the card's sales and the number of establishments involved have grown.

"Over 90 percent of the stores that advertised with Khach Card in the fall stayed on for the spring, which ends in August. They love it," Khachadoorian said.

To total this semester, over 1000 Khach cards have sold. Khachadoorian, however, has yet to see a profit.

"I have not yet turned a profit with Khach Card yet, but as an entrepreneur just finishing my first year in business, I am trying to be patient," he explained. The Amherst card for this year is effective from this past February to July 31.

The New India Restaurant's manager, Jagter Singh, reported that he sees customers using the card and coupons everyday, bringing in more business than usual.

"There are new customers who come and use the card or free coupons, so that does affect the business," Singh said.

Acupuncturist Linda Robinson at Hidas had hope that her employer's involvement in the project would slowly draw in new interest to the acupuncture field.

"I've gotten some calls, but it's not like just going out to eat. I think it's prompting people who are interested to call," she said.

"It's a matter of getting the word out," Kanaranania manager Joe Harvey agreed.

Unfortunately, not all businesses represented by the card have seen the same boost in business.

Mostly, we see a lot of the coupons; I'm not sure if I could say it actually has brought in more business," Bueno Y Sano Shift Supervisor Kelly Cittadini said.

Students have had a mixture of reactions to the cards. While many bought the card hoping to save a few dollars and believe they have been rewarded for their investment, others felt that they had to spend more money to get the savings offered.

"The Khach Card is great if you want to pay 15 dollars for one lousy tanning session in order to get one free," said Maggie Klaus, a senior Communications major.

"The card ended up taking advantage of students that didn't have a lot of money to begin with," sophomore Biology major Kevin Stromski.

"The card was a scam!" Tanya Nolan a freshman Human Nutrition major agreed.

"The card didn't represent Amherst businesses as well as it should have," Becky Hannaford, a junior Bachelor of Fine Arts, said.

Some U Mass students have enjoyed the card and found it useful.

"I like the Khach Card, because it has me enjoying eating out more," Joe Derosier, a sophomore French major, said.

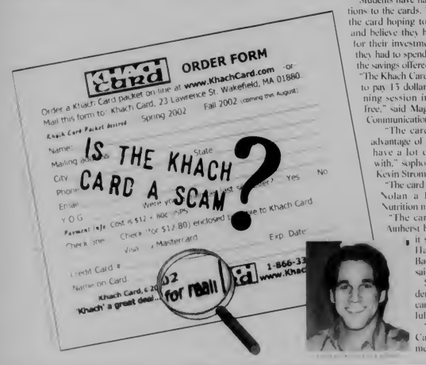
"I enjoy the card because I find myself going to places I probably wouldn't have gone to without the card," said a satisfied Noah Ditto, a junior plant and soil sciences major.

"For somebody who eats out a lot, it was a good idea buying the card," junior history major Joey Giarusso said. Ditto hit on what Khachadoorian hoped students would see: the opportunity to try new places for free or a discounted price.

"A typical discount card doesn't really generate new business. All it really does is bring in customers that may already frequent a couple places on the card," Khachadoorian said. "The huge difference with Khach Card is that it comes in a packet with 40 first time free coupons. That is the big seller. And that is what brings new customers to the businesses."

The Khach Card has also been an opportunity for student organizations and groups around town to raise money. Khachadoorian will give groups interested in using the cards to raise money about 100 packets, and for every packet they sell, they receive three or four dollars of the sales money.

The men's Amherst College hockey team sold some as a fundraiser to its peers, and currently the Amherst Regional High School's German Exchange Program is using the Khach Card as a fundraiser for its upcoming trip to Germany. Several fraternities and sororities at UMass such as Iota Gamma Epsilon, Alpha Epsilon Phi, Sigma Phi Epsilon and Alpha Delta Phi have also involved the Khach Card in their fundraising attempts.



Khach Card sales in Wakefield have not been as successful for Khachadoorian. It has seen less interest from the community and businesses there.

"Sales have not been too high, mainly because I have not made too many relationships with big fundraisers," Khachadoorian said. "Maybe it's also because it's not a college town, and it's really the students who benefit the most from Khach Card, because they are constantly trying to save money."

The Khach Card, Khachadoorian insists, is not a scam but a useful tool.

"I wish I could've had this while I was in school, since I was always pinching pennies," Khachadoorian said.

U Mass students have yet to make up their minds, but it seems as though the Khach Card has secured a place for itself in student discount programs, at least for the upcoming semester.

Hip-Hop acts bring music and message

By Rahwa Asmerom
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A celebration of poetry and music was observed at AfroSoniks on April 1 at the Top of the Campus Center.

Organizer, producer and director of the night's activities, Viviana DeJesus described the night's objective.

"This program is all about the experience of sound. Hip-hop is greater than music; it's also sound," said DeJesus. "So this is all about giving one's experiences a voice and sharing it through sound."

The New York based five-man band The Uplifters opened the night by entertaining arriving spectators with upbeat reggae music. The poetry portion of the night was soon underway after an introductory speech by DeJesus, who urged people to sign up for the open mic.

She also expressed her appreciation to the organizations that made the night possible. Groups who helped sponsor AfroSoniks included the Office of ALANA Affairs, UMass Arts Council, Black Student Union, African Student Association and Haitian American Student Association

A total of twelve acts signed up to perform for the audience. Although a good number of the "brave souls" showcased their original poetry, there were also a number of other performances. Acts included two rap duos; one from Westfield State College named Royal Smythe. Other presentations included an originally choreographed dance routine, a drum session and a freestyle performance by UMass student Ogho Oruma.

The event featured two artists. DeJesus introduced the first as internationally renowned poet and performer The Lioness Queen of Sheba. Active in promoting talent, Queen of Sheba runs a spoken word venue in Virginia named Urban Safari, where every other Friday she draws in a crowd of 250 plus people, according to DeJesus.

Her third time returning to the area, the poet repeatedly stressed the need for such open mic forums to showcase talent. Referring to up-and-coming talent and underground artists, she said, "It is really important to support people, because if we don't, they die."

Performing a total of seven pieces, the poet addressed a number of issues including ignorance, financial revolution and real love. She ended her stage presence with a powerful performance of the title track to her newest CD, "I Confess," an autobiographical poem after which the crowd gave a standing ovation.

The second featured artist was slam champion Femi Lawal from Baltimore, who goes by the stage name of Dry Fish. He awed the audience by reciting a number of energetic verses.

The night came to a close to the background of more live music from the reggae band and was a overall success in that according to DeJesus, "it was a way of creating a space for the arts, and that is what AfroSoniks is all about."

described the scenario of a woman in San Francisco who was shouted down by a crowd after criticizing the American government in a rally.

"I thought it was terrible that she was shouted down," she said. "But what I found ironic was that people were surprised by it. Conservatives are always shouted down."

Another attendee asked Sommers whether she felt that the prominence of lesbians in women's studies departments was connected to feminists' attacks on "couplehood." He also asked if she thought that women's studies departments ought to recruit heterosexuals in the name of diversity.

Sommers responded by saying that not all gays should be characterized as radicals. She pointed to two openly gay authors, Camille Paglia and Andrew Sullivan, whose work she enjoys.

"I don't see it strictly as a problem with gays or heterosexuals," Sommers said. "It's a problem with open-thinkers, and we have too few in this country."

decision is legally recognized by the state.

"When I was in Florida the faculty and graduate students unionized," Capaldi said. "Communication is very important for this kind of issue, and I would try and meet with students and try and get in touch with students on a more informal level."

Childcare and the merging of four of the five foreign language departments was also addressed, as faculty questioned Capaldi's stance on the closure of the UMass Childcare Center as well as the possibility of merging foreign languages into one main department.

Capaldi explained that she feels that before things can be changed on campus, research needs to be done within the University before programs can move forward.

"I think that childcare is a wonderful benefit, but I don't know the economics of the situation, and I'd first need to look at research done in order to move forward," Capaldi said.

However, Capaldi explained that in her experiences with merging departments, she felt that it often times does not result in large amounts of money being saved.

"Moves like that don't tend to save a lot of money, and usually faculty just move over to the new department," Capaldi said. "Faculty are key in the academic direction and we would need to work on building up programs."

Members of the SGA were also on hand to comment on their reactions to Capaldi's visit to UMass. Newly elected President Dave Carr explained that he felt Capaldi failed to discuss direct issues regarding the University.

"She talked like a politician and wasn't as direct, but that comes with different ways of dealing with leadership," Carr said.

New chancellor candidates William E. Hogan II and John V. Lombardi will also be visiting UMass this week. Open forums will be held Thursday April 4 and Friday April 5 for the new candidates from 2:45 p.m. to 3:45 p.m. in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center.

The SGA Senate will meet tonight to discuss the chancellor search as well as other pending issues at 7 p.m. in room 168C of the Campus Center.

American public can't force morals without consequences

Once upon a time there was a mayor from the small town of Georgetown, Colo. The mayor Koleen Brooks was popularly elected by the 854 voting members of the town to assist in increasing the revenue within the community and overall improving the living situation for her general constituents. She did this, and rather well up until the point where she was accused of baring her breasts in a public bar and telling members of the press that she smoked marijuana.

Now upon reading this one would assume that the "once upon a time" denotes a long time ago. After all we have been laced with antics of the likings of former President Bill Clinton and heated accusations towards Congressman Gary Condit. However the good people of Georgetown went to polls yesterday to decide whether or not to oust their mayor on the literal basis of zoning disputes.

As a side note, it was known by all of the citizens in the former mining town that Brooks was a former stripper and her character was well known. Beyond her hypothetical character flaws she did indeed build a skate park for the area children and bring new businesses into the town.

Now the real question is how far can the voting public go towards imposing morals upon their elected officials? Should Gary Condit be up for a recall vote in his home state of California because he was recently indicted for issues that related to the disappearance of his intern Chandra Levy.

If we go along with the same theory that the people of Georgetown seem to be following then yes, his job should be in jeopardy. In any other field he could potentially be facing the job market with more immediacy than he will in politics.

And to drag up the issue of former President Clinton yet again, if we are dealing with moral character he likely not the poster child for flawless behavior in the sexual arena.

Even in our own town of Amherst select board member Anne Awad when she ran for her slot in 2000 suggested that marijuana be de-emphasized by the police department. Does that mean that she has loose morals and should not be allowed to hold her position? Obviously not.

The people of Georgetown have the right to sanction their elected officials if they should break real policy or commit a grievous error within the context of their positions.

However if the American public is going to start to remove elected officials on the basis that they make mistakes then they better be ready for the consequences because this could effect a large number of people.

Lost in the translation

I don't seek a reprieve, or a pass, or an exclusion.

I simply seek a reasonable explanation of why I currently find myself struggling through French 110. Unless we are blessed enough to be the Commonwealth College, we all have our academic Achilles heels. Mine happens to be foreign languages (and the sciences and the mathematics). But especially foreign languages.

In high school, the only failing grade I ever took home, I took home from a Spanish class. I struggled my way through two years of Spanish, and before that, I struggled my way through two years of French. At the time, I reasonably explained my participation to myself as – "You have to do this, because colleges and universities want to see this on your transcript."

So fine. I studied my languages.

But now, in what I hope will be the final semester here at our University, I again find myself experiencing the same set of feelings that I did for those four years of high school. Total frustration. For example, that a language would be so ridiculous as to randomly gender nouns for no good reasons.

The more damning thing is that I don't understand what I'm doing in this class. What, exactly, am I learning?

According to the University, I am currently studying French as part of the Global Education Requirement, a truly vile creation designed to get students out of excessive language study. On that level, I appreciate its creation. On another level though, I wonder if our administrators have clearly thought out the implications of this requirement.

Supposedly, studying French will augment my study of Africa. By learning French, I will be able to better understand that continent in all of its constant flux.

There is a slight problem here.

French is the native language of the French, a group found in France, which is part of the European continent. Amazingly, it didn't develop on its own in Africa. Neither did Portuguese (my other European language option in this case - Arabic was also available, but if I can't handle accent marks, I know well enough that I can't handle a totally new alphabet).

As part of the Global Education Requirement, beside my two language classes, I have to take three classes related to the language in the area where it is spoken. I have taken two African politics courses (East and West) and two African history courses (one of which, inexplicably, didn't count). In these classes, I have learned one truth – Europe ruined Africa.

Yes, Africans fought and enslaved internally, but Europe went out of its way over the course of five hundred years to totally pillage the continent.

From slavery to colonialism, Europeans took a model that the Americans were using so well with Native Americans and applied it to the entire continent of Africa.

My classes have clearly documented this horrible abuse. From imposed class structures and favored ethnic groups to stolen resources and dissent repression, the Europeans found just about every conceivable way to rob the continent of its identity.

And that includes language.

I can guarantee that the people of Gabon or Senegal or the Ivory Coast or Tunisia or Algeria or Mali or Niger or (I could go on) were not speaking

French before the French arrived. I can guarantee that most had little interest in speaking French. I can guarantee that most were probably miffed that French became the official language of countries and areas, which were explicitly not French.

Yet I now study French because it is, supposedly, African in some way. To me, this is akin to learning German to understand the Holocaust or Japanese to understand the Rape of Nanking. Surely I am studying the language of murderers and slavers, of pirates and thugs, of thieves and rapists, of a people who forced themselves upon a continent they cared nothing about, all the while learning little about the continent itself.

In French 110, despite the occasional mention of the C'ote-d'Ivoire (I know an accent mark is missing), I am hardly learning about the continent, nor its culture, its history, its current condition or its well-being. Instead, I am studying something distinctly European.

Studying French isn't studying Africa so much as it studying the continent's former colonial rulers. In my other classes, having studied the abusive behavior of the French (and, to be fair, the Germans, Italians, British, Dutch, Belgians and Portuguese), I choke on the notion of endorsing that behavior by studying its language.

It seems like a major non sequitur, and it probably is. I know that I am missing something here. Some smart ass is going to point out that I speak English, the language of similarly abusive people. That's true, but it's not my point. I certainly don't seek the destruction of French (although it is an appealing notion...) so much as the idea that to understand Africa, I'd have to have some base knowledge of this particular language. This strikes as viciously condescending, and hardly an improvement from the days when Africa was wholesale ignored. Forcing me to study Europe to have knowledge of Africa?

I just want to know why. Why is it that a culture cannot possibly be dissected or understood without the knowledge of a language? Why is it that

I find myself struggling through a study of something distinctly European when my interest is in Africa?

Is there an explanation for this? Can any professor or administrator explain this to me?

The Minister of propoganda

BILL LARKIN

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has learned one thing, made bold by George W. Bush and the Republican administration that has become the alpha artist of oblivion. And that is towards the brazen contempt that one has to establish true terror. Not the passionate sentiment that we hear from fundamentalists, but the ability to slaughter a defenseless people. Of Sunday as his tank-thrilled Yasir Arafat's Ramallah compound, Sharon displayed a mastery of propaganda to his nation via television broadcast.

"The state of Israel is in a war, a war against terrorism. This is a war that was imposed on us. It is not a war that we decided to embark upon. This is a war over our home. The state of Israel, under my direction, made all the efforts to arrive at a cease-fire. All the time, since I was elected, in the midst of a wave of Palestinian terror, we placed before us the goal of doing everything to achieve calm and arrive at political accords."

Only an ultimate wordsmith could fashion such a string of phrases. I'm glad about one thing, however – amidst this litany of lies, Sharon has admitted that Israel is at war with the Palestinian Authority. For the past 17 months, Israel has slaughtered countless Palestinian refugees and militants as they hedge the West Bank, but has shied from a declaration of war. The global militarism following the War in Afghanistan has mitigated its shyness.

Sharon has deceived his following with a Zionist tongue. "The state of Israel seeks peace. Our hand is and always will be extended for peace with the Palestinian people and the people of the whole region. But no one should be deluded. Our extended hand does not mean that we will give in to terrorism or to terrorists."

The state of Israel, under his direction, has embarked on a war with the Palestinians. Sharon has encouraged death, not peace. The United Nations, backed by the Arab World – including influential Saudi Arabia – has proposed a cease-fire in exchange for the establishment of a permanent Palestinian state. Such an arrangement would foster trade, enrich both nations and end the bloodshed. But it is not to be. Sharon's tanks are headed for East Palestine, Ramallah and the West Bank. Sharon wants Israel to annex the disputed territory into his concept of Israel's home.

"We must fight against this terrorism, fight with no compromise, pull up these wild plants by the roots, smash their infrastructure, because there is no compromise with terrorism. It is impossible to compromise with one who is prepared, like the suicide on the streets of Israel's cities and in the twin towers in the United States, to die only to kill innocent civilians, children, women and infants – to die in order to cause fear and horror."

The phrase "war on terrorism" has become an invisible label signifying the nationalist oppression sought by its speaker. First with the master in Washington, and now with his prized pupil, a weighty precedent for Imperialism has been established. Invoke patriotism, and support will follow for the most murderous campaigns imaginable. Sharon would never research a comparison in fatalities since 1967 caused by the militants of both nations. His "innocent civilians, children, women and infants" imagery would mystify if it were juxtaposed against the Palestinian reality. Sharon does not mention the absence of a Palestinian military. He does not suggest how else Palestinians oppose Israel's occupation of their homes. Instead, he directs his audience towards today's universal and omnipotent words, "fear" and "terror."

"This terrorism is activated, directed and initiated by one man: the chairman of the Palestinian Authority, Yasir Arafat. Arafat is at the head of a coalition of terrorism. He operates a strategy of terrorism. The chairman of the Palestinian Authority is an enemy of Israel. He is the enemy of the entire free world. Everyone who seeks freedom, everyone who was brought up on the values of freedom and democracy must know that Arafat is an obstacle to peace in the Mideast. Arafat is a danger to the whole region." The Palestinian Authority and the resistance/terrorists have been unified by Sharon into one terrific enemy. Sharon has even managed to corrupt his nation's understanding of the Palestinian authority. What was a weakly supported police force whose administration is directed by Israel has been lyrically transformed into a filial state with the potential for patricide.

"The Israeli government decided at its meeting on Thursday to begin a wide-ranging operation to root out the terrorist infrastructure in the Palestinian territories. We will clean out the terrorist infrastructure from the foundations, because in the end we know that the only way to reach a cease-fire, negotiations, an accord, an agreement and peace is if we succeed in wiping out the terrorism infrastructure."

In other, less ivory words: we will penetrate their every defense, subjugating them to our laws. Time and time again, the Palestinians have expressed their need for a separate home. How can Israel hope to assimilate Muslims into a land of synagogues? The so-called terror attacks would not stop unless the Palestinians are wrought to bear enough suffering and slaughter that their souls crack and they lose their humanity. The only way for Sharon to wipe out the terrorism infrastructure is to agree to the United Nations proposal and let Palestine be. But Sharon would rather see a Palestinian genocide. Otherwise, why would he spend so much energy deceiving his people?

COLLEGIANARTS@YAHOO.COM 4.03.02 ARTS EDITOR: MIKE DELANO

Pop stars opt for movies as lifelines

The movie genre has become more appealing to pop stars over the past decade, leading many to pursue acting careers. But most films made by pop stars are trashed by critics and become box office bombs. Is it even worth pop stars to continue to pursue careers in film?

The last few weeks have seen the release of three feature films with young divas as leading ladies, with more to come, all produced with the thought that the films will flourish by the stars' built-in audience. As Mariah Carey's disastrous experience with Glitter proved last year, however, the road to Hollywood is but a sweet, sweet fantasy.

Even when the results are not as calamitous as Carey's, such movies rarely become blockbuster successes. Britney Spears' Crossroads brought in $17 million on its opening weekend but has since had a steep falloff in attendance, ending with a meager $36.7 million gross. Another diva film, Queen of the Damned, was panned when it was released on Feb. 22, although loyal fans of Aaliyah, the R&B singer who died in a plane crash in the Bahamas, propelled it to a first-place finish in that weekend's box office listings. The film subsequently ended up grossing just $29.9 million domestically. A Walk to Remember, with 18-year-old pop singer Mandy Moore in the lead, has accumulated decent but not spectacular sums in the month since it opened ($40.5 million).

Unfortunately, highly publicized debacles as Glitter, which grossed a paltry $4 million last fall, have not scared potential crossover artists. You would think after such an embarrassing box office take and critical ripping, fellow pop stars would run the other way.

In any event, pop stars have a long tradition to draw on. Frank Sinatra, Doris Day and Elvis Presley all had movie careers, even if critics did not always think much of them. In the 1960's the Beatles' classic A Hard Day's Night paved the way for music videos and remains vibrant still. Barbra Streisand went from nightclubs and Broadway to Hollywood, gaining iconic status. And Cher, who won fame alongside Sonny Bono and went on to a solo career, evolved into a respected actress, earning an Academy Award for Moonstruck in 1988.

The bellwether of financial success is Whitney Houston, whose 1992 starring vehicle The Bodyguard grossed $122 million domestically, a pinnacle no other singer has come close to attaining.

But while some of those careers lasted decades, many of today's music stars are a flash in the pan, with a few hit albums if they are lucky, followed by obscurity and "Where Are They Now" profiles on VH1.

Even Carey, whose record label paid her $28 million to walk away from her contract after the Glitter soundtrack album sold a mere 500,000 copies, may not have obliterated her chances of making a splash in Hollywood. Surprisingly, she received positive trade reviews at the recent Sundance Film Festival for Wise Girls, her latest cinematic effort, in which she worked with the Oscar winner Mira Sorvino. Carey is quietly lining up several projects to launch herself back into the pop stratosphere, and will start shooting another movie titled Sweet Science in which she will play a boxing manager. Can't wait to see the reviews on that one.

With the music industry facing some of the biggest problems in history with declining record sales and complaints by performers about record company business practices, it makes sense for singers to try other avenues of income. And since an artist has to sell several million copies of an album to turn a lucrative profit, the desire is overpowering. Making motion pictures is in the back of the minds of all music stars.

Contemporary artists are used to performing in videos and even designing their videos, which was not the case before music became such a visual medium. But a three-minute video is nothing compared to a big-budget two-hour flick.

Just because an artist is successful in one area does not mean he or she will be successful in another. Obviously caution must be taken on the film roles that stars decide to take on. Some artists insist on a movie career because they feel it wise to have a backup career if and when the music dies. Some pop stars seem willing to bet that movie careers may have longer legs than a music one plunging themselves into some of the most inanely scripted movies ever.

Another artist pursuing an acting career is Beyonce Knowles of Destiny's Child. Knowles' acting debut in MTV's hip-hop version of "Carmen" led to her playing Foxxy Cleopatra, the female lead in the new Austin Powers movie, due for release this summer and even featuring a cameo appearance by Spears. Alicia Keys, Mya, and Christina Aguilera have also voiced thoughts of pursuing an acting career in the future.

The ephemeral nature of fame means that singers' expectations of box-office success are anything but assured. On the Line, starring two members of the biggest boy band in the world, 'N Sync, roughly pulled in the same slight total as Glitter. Even more disappointing were Bones and The Wash, both with the rapper Snoop Dogg in the lead.

A perfect example of how hard it is to secure a successful career in film comes through examining the dogged efforts of Madonna. An enormously successful artist by any measure, the Queen of Pop has had trouble gaining both critical and commercial adoration, despite nearly two decades of trying. While Desperately Seeking Susan, Dick Tracy, and Evita were modest successes, little else in her 19-film career lingers. Undeterred, Madonna recently completed filming Love, Sex, Drugs and Money, directed by husband Guy Ritchie, but the movie has already received poor reviews from test audiences. In May, she will perform in London in a play called Up for Grabs.

To say that Madonna does not succeed in movies is unfair; it does not mean she does not have the talent or even that it is the wrong move. It is appropriate for artists to stretch creatively, and it is admirable for them to take risks. On stage, in the music video, and even on film, Madonna demands rapt attention when she plays herself or someone similar to herself, which is part of her success in the three aforementioned films, one of which is a musical.

Apparently, certain pop stars have to find their niche and stick with it. Choosing roles, which may be easier said than done, is once again, very important. A star is not solely responsible for a film's appeal at the box office, unlike a record, which usually bears the unmistakable imprint of the performer. Motion pictures are much more of a collaborative process.

Securing the proper film role with the necessary team also is a group project. The almighty dollar waving itself before managers and agents is irresistible. From now on, however, pop stars and agents should avoid all movies involving superficial story lines that portray a world in which all emotions are simple. (So long to sappy love stories!) Jesse Bradford and Paula Garces swim in cool special effects and little else in Clockstoppers.

Clock offers little more than kid fare

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

CLOCKSTOPPERS
Directed by Jonathan Frakes
Playing at Cinemark 12 in Hadley

Zak Gibbs (Jesse Bradford) is a normal teenager, a good kid whose biggest goal of the moment is to get his dad to co-sign for the retro Mustang he's been saving up for. He's a bit aimless in life, as all teens are, but he's not bad; the extent of his "rebellion" is to sell stuff on e-Bay with descriptions like "crash-proof word processor" (a.k.a. an antique typewriter). One day, Zak's life changes when he discovers a watch that can stop time. One press of the button, and everything slows down to the point were Zak thinks everything is standing still.

Clockstoppers, produced by the movie branch of kiddie network Nickelodeon and directed by Jonathan Frakes (Cmdr. Riker on "Star Trek, The Next Generation"), is colorful and energetic, but also a little flat. The movie, which is the second sci-fi movie in one month to deal with the manipulation of time (The Time Machine is the other), lacks the kind of imaginative, lunatic whimsy that characterized last year's Spy Kids, which was sort of a meld of James Bond and a Pee-Wee Herman movie on acid. Clockstoppers is more, I hate to say it, ordinary, hogged down by standard issue plot and dialogue, but buoyed by likable performances and impressive special effects.

The movie is most enjoyable early on, when Zak discovers his invention and has fun with it. When you activate the watch, you activate hyper time, which means your own molecules move so fast that no one can see you. So, Zak takes the cute new Venezuelan foreign exchange student, Francesca (the appealing Paula Garces) out on the town, where they exact revenge on school bullies, graffiti taggers and a meter maid. Unlike movies such as Hollow Man or The Time Machine, Clockstoppers has people use a scientific impossibility the way any normal person would use it – to have a little fun.

But there's intrigue of course. The watch was sent to Zak's college professor dad (Robin Thomas) by one of the dad's old students, science whiz Earl Dopler (French Stewart, the squinty-eyed alien on "3rd Rock From the Sun)." Dopler was working on the secret project for megalomaniac millionaire Henry Gates (Terminator good guy Michael Biehn) – gee, I wonder where they got that name – who of course wants to use the watch for nefarious purposes. Gates kidnaps Zak's dad, to replace Dopler, who was working on a machine that reverses the aging effects that occur when one spends too much time in "hyperspace" (the science gets really fuzzy). Zak and Francesca forcibly unite with Dopler to save the father and bring down Gates.

Clockstopper's plot has been cobbled together out of bits and pieces of too many other children's films. I don't feel it is particularly useful to reel off the list of cliches, but there has to be a point where movies will stop cannibalizing each other (or studios should just hire less creatively-impaired movie geeks as writers). The movie has the feel of a soda left open; by the time that the teens are breaking into the villains' compound, you may have the feeling that you are drinking nothing but watered-down syrup.

The acting is hardly going to win awards, but it helps to have young actors who can carry the weight of a tired screenplay on their back. Bradford is likable and easy-going. Garces is a charming spitfire (even if most of her dialogue sounds contrived), and Stewart actually convinces as a man who realizes that his creation is designed to do more harm the good. The special effects, while seemingly simple (or is that simplistic?) are quite good, especially the fantastic shot of Francesca pulling apart streams of water that are floating in midair, like liquid diamonds ripe for the picking. And after one too many awful teen sex comedies to count (did we really need to have Tomcats unleashed on us?), it's nice to see a teen film where semen and breasts aren't paraded as jokes. The movie is far more pleasant to see then junky duds like Showtime and Death to Smoochy. But Clockstoppers is a film that seems designed to please only the targeted "tween" demographic (9-12 years old). There is little wit or vibrancy to let it please an adult, too.

Louise Goffin's Sometimes A Circle fails to stick out amongst her singer-songwriting peers.

KMFDM's lean Attak, Goffin unextraordinary

LOUISE GOFFIN
Sometimes a Circle
Dreamworks

People who know me know I'm a sucker for female musicians. My CD collection is an embarrassment of riches, in my eyes at least, in this regard: everything from the sweet as honey melodies of Michelle Branch (who's album The Spirit Room has been my favorite of the moment since its August release), to the ethereal charms of Dido (her song "Here With Me" is my favorite), to the Goth-metal goddesses of Drain STH and the biting pop-rock of Poe. But just as hardcore metalheads will dismiss the cartoonish antics of Slipknot (deservedly so), I'm not going to heap praise upon every female singer/songwriter to wander down the grassy knoll. Case in point: Louise Goffin.

Goffin is the daughter of legendary singer/songwriter Carole King, known for creating some of the biggest songs a couple of generations ago. This isn't the first appearance of Goffin, though this is likely to be the first time anyone may have heard of her. Back in 1979 and 1981, she released a couple of albums with a New Wave band (titled Kid Blue and Louise Goffin), and then disappeared out of sight save for a GAP ad, as well as working with her mother on the theme song to th TV series "Gilmore Girls." However, she has developed little of her mother's musicianship. Goffin has learned just enough to not be an embarrassment, but not enough to make Sometimes a Circle worth a listen.

Goffin favors adding trip-hop beats to the standard singer/ songwriter formula. The songs float on spacey melodies across the entire album, but never do any of the songs hook into the brain. Every track burbles and dissipates, unsupported by any kind of strong musical thread; the entire album disappears into ether. I'm not averse to trip-hop or ethereal music; I absolutely love Ivy's album Long Distance. But Sometimes a Circle is wanly produced (by Greg Wells, who has worked with Creeper Lagoon and Rufus Wainwright), lyrically underdeveloped and sonically tired. And a little of Goffin's sultry-pouty voice goes a long way. She overdoes the vocal equivalent of batting her evelashes to the point of depriving every song of energy; it's a strange, but appropriate, coincidence that the final track is called "Quiet Anaesthesia," because the album we'll leave you numb by the end. Nelly Furtado, who expertly combines pop, bossa nova and trip-hop with a singer/songwriter sensibility, won't have to watch her back. (Johnny Donaldson)

Three years ago, I reviewed what was supposed to be KMFDM's final album, Adios. It was also supposed to be the last article I wrote for this publication. Things don't always go according to plan.

After releasing a side project album under the name MDFMK, Sascha Konietzko and company have decided that idea sucked and it was time to restore the original name and sound (?) of KMFDM. Sonically, Attak is the next logical step for the resurrected legends of German industrial. It harks back to the days of Nihil, Xtort and Money while simultaneously expanding on sounds explored in Adios and MDFMK. This album also has something to prove. The new KMFDM sound is louder and more aggressive (as the title would suggest) than in past albums. It is no less mature though, as one would expect from a band that has been around for almost 20 years.

Minus a couple members (Gunter Schultz and En Esch), Konietzko and producer/band member Tim Skold have managed to pull off the return of KMFDM. With the help of vocalist Lucia Cifarelli and Bill Rieflin (of Ministry), Attak is probably the best thing the band has released since the "5 symbols" album. The first track, "Attak/Reload" gives the album a fierce jumping-off point. Other tracks such as "Urban Monkey Warfare," "Save Me," "Superhero" and "Sturm & Drang" may not have what it takes to be classic KMFDM tunes, but are pretty good in their own right.

Is Attak going to restore KMFDM to their peak? No. Is Attak going to be the closest thing to it that we're going to get? Yes. (Kevin Monahan)

ZOO STORY
Come Out and Play
3:33 Music Group

I check my mailbox down at the Collegian every morning. I go to see if any CDs I've signed up for have been left in my little cubby slot. Occasionally I'll get a CD that I didn't count on getting to review. Usually, though, the CD is professionally put together, and I can glean a few nuggets of what I'm getting into just by looking at it. So when I found an album advance for Zoo Story's Come Out and Play (the actual record due in April) I had know idea what I was in for. There was no booklet — no cover — and the song titles ("Bardo," "Mantaray," and "If I Could Dream Like Francis") held no clue as to what this album was.

To my relief, Zoo Story turned out to sound a lot like the band Remy Zero, whom I like very much (for those who don't know them, Zero's song "Save Me" is the theme to "Smallville"). Both bands are inspired by early U2, and both bands play soaring, vital pop-rock songs. The difference is that unlike Remy Zero, Zoo Story is sloppy and unfocused, showing some potential, but never fully pouncing on it.

The band consists of lead singer Randy Coleman, guitarist Carlos Rivera, bassist Nick Sample and drummer Kevin Sheppard (formerly of Tonic), and their first single "Star" is featured in the sodden drama Dragonfly. Coleman sounds alternately like Cinjun Tate, Ed Rowland, and Gavin Rossdale, with the band going down to Bush league depths on "Mantaray" (no, that's not a compliment). But whatever dismissals a critic can come up with toward Zoo Story and their unoriginal, loose sound, one can't ignore their passion. Coleman sounds like every emotion is bleeding out through him, and the band keeps pace, never letting their voice have all the fun. Not every song is good, but every song reaches skyward with all earnestness intact. The best length of the album comes on tracks 9-11 ("Chasing Zen," "Blind Sympathy," and "She Don't Care"). These are actually quite terrific songs, more controlled than the rest of the album.

Zoo Story's biggest problem is their tendency to sprawl. I've said it before, but sprawl is one of the deadliest things to happen to a song (that's why I don't like jam bands like Phish). It takes talent to keep a song tight and focused for five, six, seven minutes. Few artists are capable of preventing a song from flagging past the five-minute mark. Zoo Story is one of those bands that are incapable, so they let their songs spiral out of control. This ends up, as in all cases, lessening the impact of the song.

I don't know. Maybe when the actual album comes out, it'll be tighter, better produced. Or maybe Zoo Story will get to learn over the course of their career. Come Out and Play is not a bad record, just one with potential that could've been better tapped. (Johnny Donaldson)

Muse delivers another shot of hyper music with The Origin of Symmetry.

Muse is plugged in, baby

By Jill Rozhart
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

MUSE
The Origin of Symmetry
Mushroom

As my first music review I strongly advise you, author to audience, to put away your notecards and dictionaries and I'll retire my Microsoft Word 2000 thesaurus, because this sure as hell isn't a carbon copy of other reviews. The reason for this being that writing about music is like talking about heroin: you simply have to experience it to know how much you'll like it.

Heroin – good transition, right? Let's leave it there...

A friend of mine in Boston first introduced me to Muse last November. I inquired about their sound and he put it brilliantly: "like Radiohead but on crack." I mocked him and labeled his remark as another over-analytical, but just not-pretentious-with-respect-to-words music critic. It turns out that the both of us were right.

The artists of Muse originated and dwell in the UK but expand their tours into Europe. Being that their record sales in the US is something to shame ourselves with, they hardly grace this musically corrupted nation with their presence – a spark that lit the fire under my butt for this article.

The Origin of Symmetry illustrates the in-TENSE-ity embodied in the band which is produced from within each instrument. Yeah, it's that scary. Most noticeably, and the rationale behind the Radiohead resemblance is Matthew Bellamy's desperate falsetto. Okay, fine, so he sounds like Thom Yorke, but he's better. Bellamy carries the note to an unreachable and intimidating level that leaves Yorke with a damp warmth down the inside of his Dickies. As for lyrics, they may not portray sing-songy images of "fake Plastic Trees" or "ooh, intriguing!" a type of (technique-y) verses looped backwards – you know, the kind of band MTV gushes over knowing that they'll be compromising both the mainstream and alternative style audiences, bringing peace and agreement among the two at keg parties. Bellamy, rather, is strictly more upfront and personal. You can't always listen to what he's saying and relate to it, but you do (please excuse the cliché) feel it.

The music itself has a great deal to do with that, though, so my argument isn't that cliché. In many ways, I find Bellamy's guitar quality of the utmost respect and high value. He traverses from a thin and punchy to full and thick sound which both compliments his voice and implements his lyrics with substance. In between verses, he supplies intricate guitar riffs and smooth chord progressions, given in abundance by bass player Chris Wolstenhome. Singled out by a careful ear, one will find that at times (as in the case of "New Wave Bliss") Wolstenhome's basslines are in traditional support of no one individual riff, but rather hold potential to be a song of their own; kind of like a middle finger to the band, but still showing up for the reunion album and tour.

Percussion, it is said, is the backbone of a song, which holds true for Muse but they just kick more butt with it. This backbone, care of Dominic Howard, is as major an intensifier as Bellamy's voice. He manipulates a nice even distribution and balance of drums, not relying heavily on high hats and symbols for sharpness and noise, or bass for beat. That's how you play the drums, ladies and gentlemen. Burn those self-instructional "Beat in a Week" videos hosted by Lars Ulrich or Rick Lick.

Obviously, as an unprofessional-professional music critic, I expect my audience to rely on my opinions as fact, buy this and all other albums I like and review, thus eventually revolutionizing the industry of rock. Should that ever become the case someday (and I pray for your sake and mine that it will), the demise of MTV will provide social chaos, economic turmoil and Tom Freston will be licking the hair gel off of Carson Daly's Rogaine implants for sustenance and for money.

But honestly kids, take this band seriously and spit on those Brit-pop-alike comparisions. Muse is to Radiohead as Ozzy is Spinal Tap. Should the latter consistently succeed the former in a matter of your taste, it's certainly none of my concern. I'm way more impartial to anything "on crack."

The two careers, movies and music, can coexist if stars play their cards right. Stars should also follow the advice of the old adage "it's not the quantity, but the quality that matters." Some stars insist on popping movies out like cookies, where substance takes a back seat to bounty. The reduced workload should also prevent visits to rehab for "mental and physical exhaustion."

UMass BRIEFS:

Softball

The Atlantic 10 Conference named senior Teri Rooney and junior Kalla Holtz as the Player and Pitcher of the Week this afternoon after two superb weekend performances against LaSalle University. The Minutewomen swept the Explorers 8-0, 9-0 and 3-0, to move to 21-10 overall and 6-0 in the conference.

Rooney led the UMass offense, hitting .600 (6-for-10) in the three-game LaSalle series. She had a double, triple and scored three runs in the victories, while recording a team high seven RBIs. Her five RBIs in game one was just one shy of the all-time UMass single-game record. Rooney, a two-time A-10 All-Conference pick, continues to be the most consistent hitter for the Minutewomen and boasts a .362 average. She leads the team in hits (54), runs (20), triples (4), RBIs (18), slugging percentage (.489) and sacrifices (7). Her four triples also tops the A-10.

Holtz receives her second nod from the A-10 this season after a two shutout performance against the Explorers (8-0 and 3-0). She held La Salle to just five hits and gave up no walks, while striking out 12 batters in 13 innings of work. Holtz has now thrown three consecutive shutouts and four this season. She has allowed 65 hits and 16 earned runs in 90 innings of work, while walking 22 and striking out 68.

The Minutewomen return to action Thursday, April 4, when they host the University of Maine for a non-conference doubleheader. Game time is at 2:00 p.m.

Men's Track

The University of Massachusetts men's track and field team opened its outdoor season this past weekend and picked up two first-place finishes at the non team-scoring Husky Spring Open, held at Solomon Track, hosted by Northeastern.

Junior Ken Scheider tied for first-place in the pole vault, turning in a new school outdoor record of 15'6.00 feet. Earlier this season, Dec. 1 at the Boston University Armory, Scheider cleared 15'9.00, setting the UMass pole vault record. The Minutemen also picked up a win in the triple jump as freshman Henry Smith won the event with a mark of 45'5.00 feet.

Senior co-captain Sal Nastasti finished second in the 1500M run with a time of 4:01.12, a shade better than teammate Kevin Curtin who finished fourth at 4:02.84 and freshman Jon Korhonen who finished seventh at 4:04.60. Classmate Mike Carr cleared 6'4.00 in the high jump placing him third.

In the 10,000M run, senior Colin Baughman finished third with a time of 33:07.85 and in the 400M hurdles junior Joe Gans finished in fifth-place with a time of 57.02.

Sophomore John O'Neil finished fifth in the long jump with a distance of 20'8.00 feet, while junior Eric Uliano finished third in the shot put with a throw of 49'01.00 feet.

The Minutemen return to action this season Saturday, April 6, at a quad-meet with S. Connecticut, Fordham, and St. John's to be held in New Haven, Conn.

Indiana's Davis becomes favorite among national media

By Dan Cortez
Indiana Daily Student (Indiana U.)

(U-WIRE) ATLANTA – It's hard not to like a guy as easygoing as Mike Davis. And for the national media that got to know him for the first time in Atlanta this weekend, it would be an understatement to say that they fell in love with him.

Andy Katz from ESPN looked giddy when he was talking to the Indiana coach this weekend in an extended interview while Linda Cohn, also of ESPN, gave Davis a big hug and told him how happy she was for him after the Oklahoma win.

And between games, Davis was poked and prodded with questions on all types of subjects. He joked that he wanted a raise after this run to the Final Four and spoke of his desire to someday coach in the NBA, prompting the media to assume he will leave after this season.

After a reporter told A.J. Move something that Davis had said, Move couldn't help but crack up.

"Coach Davis will tell (the media) anything," Move said, laughing.

Apparently Move is right. All week leading up to the Final Four the media was focused on Tom Coverdale's left ankle, assuming that he was likely to miss the game. After Coverdale played 29 minutes Saturday night, Davis tipped his hand Sunday afternoon.

"I was glad the media was talking about Coverdale because I knew he would play," Davis said. "I kept saying he's 40 percent, 50 percent, 60 percent. Then I said 70 percent. Everybody thought 'Okay, he's going to play.'

"I said I'm going to tell them 40 percent again to keep people off guard."

Several people have criticized Davis for saying the wrong things at the wrong time, but he doesn't worry too much about things like that. As Davis is known to say about himself, he is not a traditional coach.

"I just feel like in this business you need to be friends with people and try to help other people as much as possible," Davis said. "I have people call me all the time telling me 'You shouldn't do this, shouldn't do this, shouldn't say this.'

"Maybe I shouldn't. Maybe it is a game and you have to know the rules of the game to survive."

While Maryland had a standard practice Sunday, Davis and the Hoosiers stuck to their usual Sunday routine, which consists of no practice but an optional shoot around. The media was puzzled, but IU knows the drill.

"Our coaches have done an outstanding job in showing us how to win basketball games," Dane Fife said. "Coach understands that he's got guys that are willing to work for him. He knows that he has guys who are going to come in and shoot."

Perhaps the funniest comment of the week came from Davis before last night's game. The talk had been that the Terrapins were superior in athletic ability to the Hoosiers. IU was supposed to have not even gotten to the title game. The Hoosiers were supposed to be outclassed athletically by the Sooners.

Comically, Davis agreed with the doubters.

"You should shake your head because if you watch Oklahoma, Kansas and Maryland practice, and you look at us, you probably say 'There's no way (the Hoosiers) – they can win.'"

Apparently the Hoosiers are even surprising their coach.

A TOUGH TRIP: In its run to the national title game, Maryland became the first team in tournament history to advance in each round by beating the highest possible seed in each round. The Terrapins beat No. 16 Siena in the first round and beat eighth-seeded Wisconsin in the second round. In the Sweet 16, Maryland beat No. 4 Kentucky and then No. 2 Connecticut to advance to the Final Four.

In the national semifinals, the Terrapins beat No. 1 Kansas. In that game Saturday night, Maryland won 97-88 as the two teams combined for 185 points. That total is the most since IU and UNLV combined for 190 points in the 1987 national semifinals. The Hoosiers beat the Runnin' Rebels, 97-93, en route to IU's fifth national title.

After beating the Hoosiers Monday night, an exhausted Gary Williams enjoyed taking his alma mater to its first national championship in school history.

"It is just a great feeling because we had to come through some great teams to get here, some teams that have won national championships," Williams said. "It was a great thrill for us because of the competition involved. I thought Indiana was a terrific basketball team."

Playoffs approaching for Eastern contenders

Inside the NBA with David Rose

The only basketball left to watch after the Final Four came to an end is the NBA, and for most people... that's a bad thing.

This is especially the case in the Eastern Conference, or as I like to call it, The P.A.L. compared to the much deeper Western Conference. However, while the Western Conference might have the deeper teams, the Eastern Conference will provide something that the west can't; "A free-for-all to reach the NBA Finals just so that they can get ghetto slapped by Shaq and the Lakers."

The landscape of the East postseason comes down to the last three weeks in which 10 teams are realistically still alive.

"The Chunky Soup Category"- Cream of the Crop

New Jersey – The Nets have struggled as of late, but by default might garner the number one seed as they lead Detroit by two and a half games with just eight to play. Jason Kidd has sewn up League MVP honors with his array of heart-stopping passes and clutch shooting that has led the Nets to a plus 21 in the win department.

The key for the Nets will be the play (?) of Kenyon "Elbows" Martin. The reason for the question mark is because the main question for him will be how many times Martin is suspended during the postseason for flagrant fouls. He is too good of a player (14.8 points, 5.3 rebounds per game) to become the NBA's newest answer to a flying elbow drop in the WWF. His own team must feel his presence in the scoring department and not his elbows against the opposition.

Detroit – Ben Wallace is my favorite player to watch on the defensive end. His presence makes the Pistons a threat. Here is Wallace's average the last five games: 20.2 rebounds, 5.2 blocks and 2.6 steals a contest. That speaks volumes about his defense, which will easily make him NBA Defensive Player of the Year.

Jerry Stackhouse has provided his usual scoring touch (21.9 ppg), but Clifford Robinson has taken the leadership role in this first season, coming up with 14.4 points per game in his first season in the Motor City. With balanced scoring and Wallace in the post, the Pistons might be able to advance to the NBA Finals for the first time since the days of the Bad Boys.

"The Ramen Noodle Category"- Simple, Yet Effective

Boston – The Celtics have added some NBA excitement to what has been a fantastic 6 months in the Boston area for sports. Antoine Walker and Paul Pierce are both in the top 15 in scoring and the additions of Rodney Rodgers and Tony Delk via a trade from Phoenix have made the Celts deeper.

Unfortunately, deeper also talks to how far the Celtics shoot the basketball from, as they lead the NBA in three point attempts (1759 in 74 games), and Walker and Pierce are number one and two in long range bombs thrown this year. That combined with the woeful center tandem of Tony Battie and Vitaly Potapenko might let the Celtics win one round, but not much more than that.

Philadelphia – You can't count out the defending conference champs. Allen Iverson's injury might turn into a blessing in disguise if the 76ers make the postseason. A healthy and rested Iverson might be the most dangerous statement in the NBA as it heads to the second season. Iverson will win the scoring title (31.4 points per game) and along with center Dikembe Mutombo and forward Derrick Coleman give the 76ers three scoring threats from all over the court.

Eric Snow has also emerged in "The Answer's" absence to become a team leader. If the playoffs started today, Philly's first round opponent: Detroit. I am thinking Detroit is hoping that they move to either the six or the eight seed cause no one wants to play them.

Orlando – First can I just say something here, "Patrick Ewing, can you please retire."

Now that that part is over with, Tracy McGrady will try to be the one-man gang again for the Magic in the post season. However McGrady averaged 33 points per game in the first round last year and the Magic was still bounced in four games by Milwaukee. Unless Mike Miller, Darrell Armstrong and the rest of McGrady's supporting cast step up the same fait will await Orlando.

Charlotte – Unfortunately, I might be the only person who knows that the Hornets are going to the postseason, cause apparently no one in Charlotte gives a damn. That's why they are probably moving to New Orleans. Baron Davis and Jamal Mashburn can burn any team from the outside, but the frontcourt is the key. P.J. Brown and the return of Elden Campbell might make the frontcourt formidable, but if Campbell continues to be inconsistent in the post, the Hornets move to the Bayou will be much sooner.

Chicken Broth"- Not Much Flavor. Not Much of a Chance

Milwaukee – Will the real Bucks please stand up? That is a hard answer for anybody else to answer considering the fact that the Bucks have no clue what the answer to that question is either. At 38-34 after an embarrassment on Sunday against Boston, it seems like the Bucks want to pack it in instead of making and NBA Title Run. The Big Three (Ray Allen, Sam Cassell and Glen Robinson) must show up or they will be shown the door from the postseason early.

Indiana – With Jalen Rose gone, the Pacers have been stuck in neutral with the gear almost in reverse. Ron Artest is the key, if he can provide another outside shooter, the Pacers might be fine, if not, there is a chance Indiana does not make the postseason.

Toronto – No Vince Carter, no problem, except for the fact that they might not have him until the second round, if they even get to the postseason, which would be an incredible feat. Antonio Davis, the time is now to earn your newly found riches.

U. Minnesota stadium's future planned

By Maggie Hessel-Mial
Minnesota Daily (U. Minnesota)

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS – Stadiums have been the talk of the town since a possible Major League Baseball contraction first clouded the minds of many Minnesota sports fans late last year.

State legislators are hammering out their final proposal to fund a new home for the Minnesota Twins baseball team within the next two weeks.

An initiative to build a shared football facility for the University of Minnesota football team and NFL's Minnesota Vikings is barely breathing, with legislators hesitating to fund two stadiums during a year with a $2.3 billion state deficit.

But some legislators say that with a significant National Football League stadium grant deadline quickly approaching, the window of opportunity is closing.

"There is no good time to solve this problem," said Sen. Steve Kelley, DFL-Hopkins. "The things we're talking about doing for funding don't add or detract from the budget problems we have in front of us."

The NFL has a matching program for teams wishing to build stadiums. Vikings owners have agreed to contribute $100 million for the facility, adding to the NFL's $51.5 million grant.

The program is slated to end in March, and many legislators say this is a deciding factor in the process of financing a second stadium for the Gophers and Vikings.

"We would be stupid to not capitalize on that revenue stream," said Rep. Mary Liz Holberg, R-Lakeville. "There is more money on the table for a Gophers/Vikings stadium than the Twins have."

The Senate and House have passed their respective Twins stadium bills, and a conference committee will meet sometime this week or next to smooth out the differences.

In the Senate's version, taxes would be mandated on memorabilia, parking and food sold at the facility. The revenue generated from the additional "user fees" would go into a Sports Facilities Account, which could be used to fund a Gophers/Vikings football facility, Kelley said.

The House's offer includes a local food, beverage and lodging tax on area residents where the stadium would be built.

"A lot of people think there is some role the state should play in this," Kelley said. "Most people don't think we should be using general fund money to fund this."

Rep. Phyllis Kahn, DFL-Minneapolis, said she would prefer to renovate the Metrodome into an updated football stadium to avoid the extra cost of building a new one.

"I would like to see the head of the person on a platter who said we should take down the original stadium," Kahn said. "To tear down and want to build over 20 years later is an outrageous waste of resources."

The original Memorial Football Stadium – which once occupied the current site of the Gateway alumni center – was torn down in 1982 when the team moved into the Metrodome.

Kahn said she didn't think much would be accomplished this session on a University stadium and said the University's funding requests for other building projects are much higher priorities than an on-campus stadium.

Sen. Roy Terwilliger, R-Edina, said he thinks making plans for a Gophers/Vikings stadium now is a good venture.

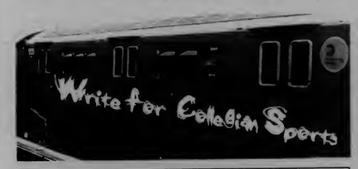
"I don't think we should rule it out completely," Terwilliger said. "Important groundwork was laid on it this year."

He also said with the economy suffering and low bonding rates available, new stadiums could help create additional jobs and tax revenue.

One impediment to funding a Gophers/Vikings stadium this session is the House's request for a referendum to approve its plan's additional taxes.

If the Senate's Sports Facilities Account and the House's plan of additional food, beverage and lodging taxes both remain in the conference committee's final bill, a referendum could be necessary to implement these taxes.

Holberg said she thinks a referendum would kill the stadium plan because few taxpayers would give the go-ahead to pay the additional fees.



"I think the referendum is necessary, but I think it's iffy at best that the taxpayers will want to pay," she said.

Terwilliger said he believes representative democracy gives legislators the power to make decisions on taxes.

"These are the types of decisions that we have a representative form of government for," he said. "I don't think we should do everything by referendum."

While the fate of the Gophers/Vikings stadium is unclear, legislators are pushing their political might to keep the idea of the project alive through the final weeks of the session.

"I favor solving this problem," Kelley said. "With the (Twins) bill out of the House and Senate, we've got a way in conference committee – with the participation of the governor – to come up with a workable plan that meets the criteria of all sides."

Marcum, Williams address sports cuts

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Members of the seven athletic teams recently cut from the athletic department gathered for a meeting on Tuesday evening in order to better understand the reasoning behind the athletic cuts.

Chancellor Marcellette Williams and Athletic Director Robert Marcum answered questions from a panel of four athletes from the men's track team at the meeting, held in Room 917 of the Campus Center and attended by approximately 50 UMass athletes. In her opening statement Williams gave the background of the state fiscal crisis, and the necessity of cuts throughout the entirety of the campus.

"My words aren't meant to soothe you. I don't intend for the words to do that," Williams said. "What I do want you to hear from me is the truth ... about the decisions being made on campus."

Brian Cronin, speaking for the panel of student-athletes, opened by saying the group came "to discuss the lack of communication between administrators and those" affected by the decisions. Cronin continued by quoting President William Bulger's response to the athletic reductions. In a March 11 press release, Bulger said that he was "confident that in concentrating and focusing our efforts in this manner, the result will be greater stability and greater success." Cronin responded that he believed this statement was a "great insult to our athletes and achievements."

The meeting continued with a question-and-answer session between the two panels. In response to a question regarding the directive of the cuts, Marcum explained that the men's basketball team, once a profit-generating program, has been on a "downward spiral financially" and was the crutch that helped support the rest of the athletic program. He continued by saying that he asked all the Associate Athletic Directors to compose a model for the process, and that together they reached a consensus for the best possible solution. Marcum added that the department had anticipated this program for months, and said that decisions should have been made sooner.

"In hindsight, maybe we should have started this process two years ago," he said.

Marcum alluded to another difficult cut that might be announced next week. It has been speculated that these cuts might pertain to scholarship reductions for the football team.

"I think I-AA football is in trouble across the country," he said, mentioning that all I-AA schools nationwide will have to undergo an examination of funding for their respective programs.

Rumors have been circulating that all Division I-AA football programs could potentially be facing scholarship reductions from the current number of 63 to 30 scholarships.

The panel continued by asking if there had been any consideration by the department as to the possibility of maintaining the programs as donor-funded. Marcum responded by saying the idea was unrealistic, saying that the department had attempted a similar strategy in the past, but never was able to generate significant funding.

Marcum stated that he believed UMass should look to UConn as the benchmark athletic institution in New England. The panel responded by asking how UMass could ever compare themselves to the Storrs, Conn. school in light of the athletic cuts and the differences in state funding between the two campuses. Marcum responded by saying that UMass couldn't "unless you are willing to put the resources forth."

Cronin ended the meeting by expressing disappointment saying, "I don't feel that any of our questions were addressed." He added that he hoped that a similar meeting with administrators could occur in the future.

Women's lax feeling Green

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Attention to detail. Often it is the difference between winning and losing, but it is also the difference between a good team and a great one.

In the first half of Friday's game against Duquesne, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team made a series of mental mistakes that allowed the Dukes to open up a 6-1 lead in the first 19 minutes and went into halftime up 8-4.

But in the second half the Minutewomen got their act together, focused on the task at hand and outscored Duquesne 12-5 over the final 30 minutes en route to a 16-13 win.

Instead of having a good 50 minutes, UMass (6-2, 3-0 Atlantic 10) will need to limit the mental mistakes and play its game from start to finish in order to pick up its seventh win of the season this afternoon at Garber Field against Dartmouth.

"We're at a point where the team is focused and they're ready to play," UMass head coach Phil Barnes said. "They're goal is 60 minutes of taking care of the details, doing what they need to do and playing together as a team. That's the expectation they have for themselves not only as individuals, but as a team."

The Big Green come into the contest ranked No. 14 in the nation and in the midst of a two-game winning streak, knocking of Ivy League foes Columbia and Brown, 14-1 and 7-6, respectively. The Minutewomen are 1-1 against ranked opponents this season but have not beaten Dartmouth since 1987, and will be looking to make up for last season's 13-3 drubbing handed to them by the Big Green in Hanover, N.H.

Traditionally one of the region and nation's best teams, Dartmouth's success in 2002 can largely be attributed to senior goalie Sarah Hughes. The school career leader in saves has played every minute this season, averaging nearly eight saves a game while holding opponents to under five goals per contest during Dartmouth's four victories.

With Hughes taking care of matters at the back for Dartmouth, senior preseason all-American Jen Newitt and junior Whitney Jamison have been free to lead the line at the other end of the field. The pair rank one-two on the squad in scoring with Newitt scoring a team-high 19 goals and her partner in crime Jamison leading the way with 10 assists.

"As a team their offense is very disciplined, their attack is organized and moves very well," Barnes said of this afternoon's opponent. "They're very effective with their movement off the ball and they have some very good individual players."

Junior co-captain Bridget Byrne will be handed the task of marshalling the young UMass backline against the potentially explosive Dartmouth attack. All season long the Glenside, Pa. native has been asked to shut down the opposition's top attacker, a task that has brought her up against some of the nations best.

But Barnes believes that UMass will need a strong team game, not just a good showing from Byrne and her defensive counterparts this afternoon to shut down the Big Green and pick up the victory.

"The beauty of this team is that when they take care of the individual details they also take care of each other and that's the thing that really showed during the second half of the Duquesne game," Barnes said. "We're a very strong team and when we play together as a team we have performances like we did on Friday."

On Tuesday UMass junior Lydia Robinson was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week for the first time this season. The midfielder scored seven goals and added an assist to lead the Minutewomen to a pair of conference wins over St. Bonaventure and Duquesne.

On Friday against the Dukes, Robinson set a career high with five goals in the Maroon and White's come from behind win. Four of her five goals came in the second half as the Minutewomen erased an 8-4 halftime deficit to win 16-13.

Jada Emery looks downfield for an open player in her team's 9-5 win over Harvard on March 9. Her women's lax team is back in action this afternoon at 4 p.m. at home against Dartmouth.

Jeff Altieri has posted a mere .230 batting average this season compared to his .339 average of a year ago.

Minutemen travel to Fairfield in hopes of ending losing ways

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When it rains it pours.

It certainly has been pouring on the Massachusetts baseball team (7-12, 1-5 Atlantic 10) in the last dozen games.

After starting out the 2002 season at 5-2, UMass has dropped 10 of its last dozen games, and was outscored 104-52 in those contests. A win in this afternoon's contest at Fairfield University is vital for the Minutemen to right the ship before the upcoming weekend's three-game series against Dayton at Earl Lorden Field.

The good news for the struggling Maroon and White is that the Fairfield squad hasn't been playing very good baseball of late, either. The Stags have dropped nine of their last ten games by a combined score of 84-55.

UMass has played well thus far against Connecticut-based teams, sweeping Quinnipiac in a home and home series (10-3, 5-4), Sacred Heart (8-6), and Hartford (7-4).

There have been some bright spots for the Minutemen in the season's first 19 contests.

Senior ace Jesse Santos has been impressive, posting a 3-1 record and a 2.79 earned run average. The right-hander has struck out 31 batters in just over 38 innings, but has struggled when getting himself into trouble (26 walks, five hit batsmen).

Classmate Brian Hourigan has been the only other hurler the team has been able to lean on so far. The righty has a 1.71 ERA in six appearances (two starts), striking out 19 in 26.1 innings pitched.

The emergence of sophomore shortstop Mike Athas has been a nice surprise for Coach Mike Stone's squad. The Holyoke native is second on the team with a .318 batting average while slugging at an even .500.

Senior captain Aaron Senez has been the team's most valuable position player by far. The third baseman is hitting at a .357 clip and is tied with Chris Morgan for the team lead in runs batted in (14). Top that off with a .984 OPS (on base percentage plus slugging percentage) and it's obvious why Senez was chosen as the team leader.

Sophomore Cullen Maumas rounds out the trio of Minutemen batting over .300 (.302). A more impressive stat for the second year player, however, is that he has struck out just two times in 43 at bats.

UMass looked like it was finally back on track last week, beating Hartford on its home field Wednesday 7-4. The Maroon and White benefited from a strong outing for Horrigan, who went the full nine innings, striking out 10 while walking just two.

Senez was good for three RBIs in the contest behind a 2-for-3 performance.

UMass followed it up with a victory over A-10 rival George Washington (14-12, 4-2 A-10). Santos pitched a gem in the first game of Friday's doubleheader, giving up four runs while pitching the full seven innings.

Morgan drove in two runs and Athas drilled a homerun to lead the offense in the triumph.

But the Maroon and White lost its steam in the second game of the doubleheader, dropping the contest 13-6, and lost to GW again Saturday, 13-9. Underclassmen Keith Doherty and Eric Chown were charged with the respective losses.

Now UMass must face a team that is in the midst of its own six-game losing streak. Both the Minutemen and the Stags are desperate to change their losing ways.

There is nothing like a little desperation to make for an Ace baseball pitcher Jesse Santos (3-1) should be on the mound this afternoon against Fairfield.

SGA ratifies elections

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last night members of the Student Government Association Senate debated and ratified this year's 2002 Presidential and Trustee elections.

The ratification however, was called to debate over one of the four referendum questions on this year's ballot. Questions over the student approval to lower the student fee towards housing governments fund from three dollars to one dollar. Commuter area governor Rob Moore explained that he felt the fee decrees could potentially harm program funding in area governments.

"This referendum question is a dangerous component of the ratification of these elections," Moore stated. "The number of students who voted on this showed that out of the 2100 student ballots cast, that over 800 students left this question blank, not knowing what it could mean."

Moore further explained that he felt that students didn't fully understand the question posed, and therefore people who did vote, voted based upon the first thing they saw.

"It's like the Pepsi taste test, people are likely to pick the first available option, and in this case "yes" was first," Moore said. "This campus has a long history of changing what is important, take safety for instance and the fact that the Escort Service was implemented a few years ago, and now it's gone. This is what is going to happen with our area governments if this passes."

Mike Taugher, chair of Ways and Means, however, disagreed. He explained that the budgets for each area government are looked at separately. He continued to explain that the Senate and Ways and Means unanimously passed the referendum questions prior to the elections.

"Ways and Means takes all the different groups into consideration and we look at the merits of each individual group, so I don't see why there should be a problem passing these elections," Taugher said.

Moore continued the debate by explaining that by cutting the student fee's programming put on by area governments; specifically the commuter area government would be harmed.

"A lot of our funding goes to various Registered Student Organizations and programming events," Moore said. "We fund a program every Monday night in the Student Union for commuters, specially single parents called "Dinner on Us" and this would be in jeopardy if cut."

The Senate ratified the elections unanimously.

A motion calling for the suspension of the Radical Student Union was brought before the Senate by Senator Zack Spilman.

Debate sparked just two weeks ago when it was suggested by Spilman that the RSU was placing racist posters up around campus endorsing their guest speaker Neel Ignatiev's talk on the abolition of the white race.

Last week members of the RSU addressed the issue before the Senate explaining that they were not being racist, but critically analyzing and resisting racism at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

"We will continue to critically analyze and resist racism in society and on this campus and we further encourage further dialogue around this issue," RSU member Katie Fident said.

Spilman spoke to the Senate last night explaining that he had talked to members of the administration regarding the posters and the RSU's conduct.

"I feel that we should suspend the Radical Student Union for displaying racist messages before the students," Spilman said. "Students brought up issues regarding the posters and they are being brought to the University Council."

The Senate failed to place the motion on the agenda.

Senators discussed issues surrounding the Student Legal Services Office and it's budget allocation. The SGA and the Graduate Student Senate currently fund the SLSO, however Senators brought forth issues surrounding the GSS inability to pay the $90,000 in funding.

"For seven of the past eight years the SGA has been paying what the GSS has

RSU video sheds light on agenda of the media

By Catherine Turner
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Veteran Radical Student Union video hero Noam Chomsky was back again last night in a film entitled Manufacturing Consent.

The documentary, running roughly three hours long, described both Chomsky's history as an activist, but also his view that the media operates to control thought in American society.

"Take a close look at how the media operates," Chomsky said, "and the necessity to find ways to marginalize and control thought."

The first part of the film was entitled, Thought Control in a Democratic Society. During this part of the video, Chomsky condemned the United States government, as well as governments in general, as a state in which power is derived by violence. He cited the US invasion of South Vietnam as one instance.

"We should be seeking forms of authority and domination and challenging their legitimacy," Chomsky said. "Any form of coercion and control requires justification."

He spoke at length about the ideas of freedom and democracy and the freedom of speech. In terms of propaganda and media, he believes that the conception of democracy has become an elitist value, where the masses are ignorant and should be controlled. The mass media is reducing people to apathy.

"The primary function of mass media is to influence and promote special interests," he said. "The Government and corporations make decisions and play a dominant role in what happens in society. [They have a] need to satisfy their interests."

Chomsky calls on corporate media outlets such as the New York Times and CBS as tools through which agendas are set. They create history. They also decide what it is that is most important to pay attention to, versus what should and can be ignored.

"History is what appears in the New York Times archives," Chomsky said. "Whose interests is history being shaped?"

According to the film, the media is owned and operated by large conglomerates of corporations, whose goals are to increase the sale of advertisements. Therefore, the media is oriented in a way to satisfy the interests of the corporations and increase the prices of their ads.

"These are the people who have power. People who own the country and they're not going to let people get out of control in the country," Chomsky said. "[They provide] a perception of the world that satisfies the perceptions of the sellers and buyers of the products."

This includes marginalizing and excluding dissenting perspectives, according to Chomsky.

A major topic discussed in the film was the subject of war, and more importantly, the role that the media plays in relation to war. Specific examples were highlighted, including the genocide in Cambodia by Pol Pot and the atrocities that occurred in East Timor.

Chomsky explained that in the case of Cambodia, the US media covered and even embellished reports of the violence because the Asian nation was a foreign enemy. However, in the case of East Timor, there was a media blackout in the US because the violence was a direct result of US actions.

Author Harpaz speaks about Hilary campaign

By Howard Weiss-Tisman
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Beth Harpaz, author of The Girls in the Van, an account of Hillary Clinton's campaign for the U.S. Senate, spoke yesterday in Bartlett Hall. Harpaz, a reporter for the Associated Press [AP], spoke about the way the media covered Clinton's changing hairstyles and choices of clothing, while, in her opinion, missing the larger historic events that were unfolding.

"The media was chasing the little stories, while I saw that this was bigger than the daily stories," she said.

Clinton was the first First Lady to run for elected office, and the first woman to win a statewide seat in New York State. While covering her campaign for the AP, Harpaz realized that the race needed to be documented.

Referencing the book The Boys on the Bus, the story of the 1972 presidential race between Richard Nixon and George McGovern, Harpaz spoke about the differences seen in Clinton's 2000 campaign. While The Boys on the Bus talks about busloads of male reporters "drinking, womanizing, and being macho," Harpaz said that most of the reporters covering Clinton were women.

"Most times when you go into the press room, there are 20 men and three or four women," she said. "On Hillary's bus most of the staff, as well as the reporters were women."

"Politics is largely a man's game and Hillary broke barriers," Harpaz added. "She spoke out on her own agenda, and transformed the definition of the First Lady."

Harpaz also said the media missed the story on Clinton's listening sessions. These were gatherings where Clinton would meet with voters [as the media made fun of them.] Harpaz saw the sessions as being very successful in reaching woman voters.

"I saw this happen," she said. "Republican women would listen to her and at the end of the speech, come over and offer to volunteer for the campaign."

Harpaz added that she feels that Hilary Clinton is a polarizing personality. She said she had mixed feelings about Clinton, and it was very hard to get access to her.

"She used the secret service like a bubble," said Harpaz. "I verything is calculated. She is a very difficult person."

She also spoke of the mistakes that the Clinton campaign made, especially early on. At one meeting Clinton spoke with the mother of a student who had been shot, a major story that most New Yorkers were familiar with. Clinton said she was sorry about the boy's death, when the mother said that her boy was alive. This gaffe, on an important New York story, made it into Harpaz's lead that day.

The Girls in the Van has been optioned for television. The paperback edition will be released in the coming months.

■ RSU video

In both places, the US played a part in the slaughter of innocent people, however, after the emergence of Pol Pot, the US shifted the blame and was able to demonize him as an evildoer. In East Timor, 90 percent of the arms that the Indonesians were using against the Timorese were supplied by the United States.

Chomsky argued that the US media was reluctant to report on any of the atrocities prevalent in East Timor because they didn't want the American public to be aware of their actions.

"As the atrocities reached their peak in 1979, coverage dropped to zero," Chomsky said. "There is no western concern for atrocities if there is a profit to be made. We're dealing with real human beings that are dying because of policies that we are directly involved in. The reason why [they] go on is because the media let them."

He also cited the Gulf War as an example of the way that the media is used as a government tool to entice public support.

"The role of the media is to present the relative background and then offer a forum of debate on this discussion. That never happened. 99.9 percent of the discussion excluded the option of a peaceful settlement."

The second half of the video, entitled Activating Dissent, touched on the actual way that the media excludes independent thought and disagreeing perspectives.

When asked why he's never been asked to appear on such mainstream television shows as Nightline on a regular basis, Chomsky explained the concept of concision. Because of this condition of concision, he argues that critical discussion is eliminated.

"You can't give evidence in the condition of concision, [in only a few] sentences between commercials," he said. "That's the genius of it." Because of this genius, Chomsky asserts that activists or dissenters that are arguing an idea that deviates from the indoctrinated social norm are made out to look like creatures "from Neptune."

He also argued that because most people internalize the values that they are exposed to via mass media, if more dissenters were featured on shows which operate with the condition of concision, they would be more alienated by mass viewers just because they wouldn't have time to explain their radical view.

An example of an activist being alienated was presented in the video clips of Chomsky trying to respond to and defend his view toward a French professor who wrote a book claiming that the Holocaust didn't exist.

Chomsky, who had actually simply written a statement in which he defended the Frenchman's right to freedom of speech, was attacked by members of the media, both in the US and abroad, for supposedly defending the view presented in the professor's book. Chomsky then took great pains to try and explain that he was only supporting freedom of speech, and not any particular view.

In fact, Chomsky, born of two Hebrew School teachers, went to great lengths to try and convince disbelievers that he does not support any view which holds that the Holocaust didn't exist.

"You can't affect the structure of power because that would be a social revolution," he said.

Finally, the film focused on the isolation of mass media, the concentration of resources and power, and the challenges of independent or alternative media. "Alternative media is going to have quite a battle."

Chomsky also expressed his concern that political systems, including the one in existence in the United States, increasingly function without public consent.

"[Corporate and government] institutions do not reflect the interests or concerns of the public they represent," he said.

The entire film was framed in a way in which Chomsky was viewed as the "most important intellectual" in the country today. In addition to video clips from television appearances were a myriad of clips from lectures and talks he has given.

There were also many scenes from Cambodia and East Timor, as well as shots from behind the scenes at CBS news and other news agencies. The team behind the documentary was from a Canadian group called Necessary Illusions.

After the show a few people stuck around to participate in a discussion being led by RSU members Will Hillyard and Neil Nugent.

"Even though it was made in '93 he raises timeless types of issues," George Roberson, a graduate student in the Geography department said. "Since this was made these issues have come right back up to the top. [Especially] with the wars going on now."

"We like to give UMass and the people in the area a chance to learn about Chomsky and his views," Hillyard, an undeclared freshman said. "The first time I saw this was the first time I even heard about what was going on in East Timor."

Nugent, who runs the RSU video series, talked about Chomsky's insight. "Manufacturing Consent connects aggressive US foreign policy to the dominant business community to the mainstream news media," he said.

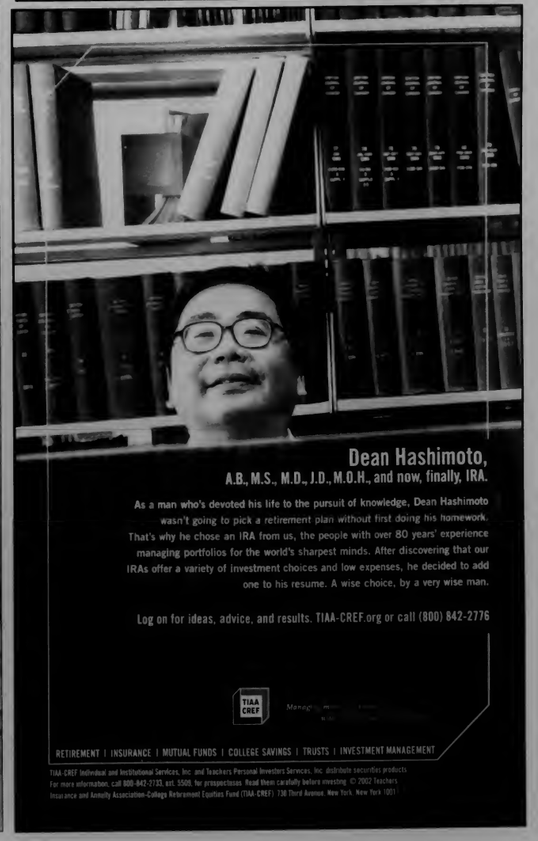
been unable to pay, and we just can't do it anymore," Speaker Aaron Saunders said. "We pay 75 percent of their budget, and the GSS pays 25 percent, but they have only been able to contribute $50,000, leaving the SGA to make up the $40,000 difference."

Senators brought forth the possibility of cutting out the GSS from the SLSO. Saunders explained that the SGA is currently looking at a variety of possibilities to deal with the situation.

"We don't want to cut the graduate students out from legal services, but it's just not fair to the SGA," Saunders said. "But were weighing our options as to where to go from here."

Senators concluded their meeting with a brief message from newly elected President Dave Carr who explained to the Senate his goals for the up and coming year. He also announced to the Senate that nomination papers are available for all interested students in the SGA office.



"Right now I'm getting started on all the promises that I made in my campaign and am trying to meet with as many administrators as I possibly can," Carr said. "I really want to get students in the SGA and involved in my cabinet as well. I'm just focusing on getting this year kick started right now."

Language program:
system needs revamping

Sweeping changes are in order here at the University of Massachusetts, changes that must differ in range and scope than the continued downsizing of an already shrinking faculty.

As addressed in these pages recently, the foreign language requirement at UMass must be re-examined and altered in order to fit within the framework the remainder of the University is squeezing into.

As it is now, for someone in the College of Arts and Sciences – let's say, English and Journalism majors – a student is required to prove him/herself proficient in a given language up to a second intermediate level, which most commonly means that a succession of four classes must be taken to satisfy the needs of UMass.

This system has continually drawn uninterested students into a commitment that often enough interferes with their primary studies. Instead of using the valuable class slot – especially valuable now that professors are hightailing it out and available classes are dwindling – to fulfill their primary course of study, they instead are pushed off into classes that do little to augment their education.

What's more important – creative writing for an English major, or Italian III? Courses in network security for a computer science major, or the ability to tell a class what you did for your spring break in broken Spanish? Or French? Or German?

Styles of teaching between courses and professors are often wildly different, making the transition from course to course especially jarring. Where one teacher thought it was appropriate to end a class, another might see it as too far behind and rush the class to catch up. Not all languages have an exemption exam. There are simply too many holes for it to continue as we have seen in the past.

There's no doubt that the foreign language department is an asset to the University and those who decide to shape their education by studying in it. For the rest of us, however, it's a long form of distraction in which little knowledge is actually culled as the majority of students coast just to get by. Where's the benefit in that?

The University needs to give strong consideration to this problem. Perhaps two semesters instead of four, or one semester of a language and one in a related class. (Italian I and Studies in Italian/Foreign film, for instance). Something that will give the students exposure to something new while keeping it interesting and diverse enough to appreciate.

For a diversity-minded requirement, the system as it is right now is woefully narrow-minded.

Pre-registering a big fat joke

DAN LAMOTHE

So. Our choices for classes for the fall semester are out. The list is available online. Point blank: it scares the hell out of me.

If you're looking for a column filled with hope, turn the page. If you're looking for a column that says everyone at UMass will be all right once the budget cut dust settles in the fall, turn the page. This ain't it. Wake up. Hear this loud and clear.

We have no idea how bad it really could be on campus this fall right now. None.

Why? Because the fact of the matter is, our bud get for the fall isn't passed yet. We know it won't be pretty. We know we're going to get screwed. We have no idea how badly. That ought to be enough to have every one of you quaking in your Nikes.

As I stared at my computer screen blankly trying to figure out what classes I need to take for the fall semester, it hit me. Our fall semester budget hasn't been passed. Ok. Fine. That's nothing new. There is one small, tiny, insignificant problem as we near pre-registration.

Not to make a mountain out of a molehill. But how the hell do we pre-register for classes that may or may not exist?

Until the budget comes in, we really don't know what we have for options on classes. Granted, the budget never comes in before we pre-register. But this year is different, and everyone knows it. UMass and the Whitmore stooges can give us a pre-reg guide all they want. It means nothing right now. Nothing. Things are that uncertain on Beacon Hill right in talks about UMass. Pick a class, any class. Some will exist, some will not. Many others will be oversubscribed because of the elimination of all of the classes that we already know are gone for the fall semester.

You know all of those kids who didn't have a full schedule at the beginning of this semester? Or who didn't have any classes at all? Unless you've been living under a rock behind Sylvan somewhere, you do.

Y'all ain't see nothing yet.

I'm calling it. Me, the ever-optimistic wiseass, has gone gloom and doom on the fall semester. Yeah, I'm that worried. Full schedule of classes? I'll believe it when I get the paperwork. Maybe. They'd better sign it in blood, with the amount of trust left that our University deserves from its student body.

I'm trying to get out of here certified to teach English. Forty-two credits of the stuff over the next two or three years is what it's going to take for me to do it. Yeah. I know. That's a lot of reading. I've got a set program of classes that I need to take. It's very defined. Very little leeway. So what's the problem? I shouldn't even have any choices to make.

Damn near none of the classes on that program exist next semester on this campus. And that's before Tom Finneran pulls the rug out from under us and hands us our budget, sliced and diced like some Ginsu chef.

You'll have to excuse this nervous twitch. It's new. I call it "I-wonder-if-I'll-ever-graduate" syndrome. Don't let me lead you on here. I haven't had trouble in my classes. My GPA's sitting just fine, well above 3.0. I'm not going to fail out of here anytime soon.

But how does a brother graduate when he can't get into any of the classes he needs? How many useless filler courses can someone take to fill out their schedule and keep their full-time student status before they fall behind in their major and aren't able to graduate? Tacbo, volleyball and swimming will only get one so far in the business world, you know? Don't get me wrong. The college experience and all that is great. Taking classes from a broad variety of fields is a great idea, and I'd love to do it. Political science? Sign me up. Sports studies? I'd love to take a class or two with them.

How many useless filler courses can someone take to fill out their schedule and keep their full-time student status before they fall behind in their major and aren't able to graduate?

There's this thing called reality, though. With reality comes responsibilities and a lot of crap. With that crap goes 42 credits of English class and one hell of a headache.

So, UMass, don't tell me I can't get into the classes I need. Don't tell me that half of the classes on this ridiculous program of study don't exist next semester. Don't tell me I will still need them to graduate anyway. And don't tell me that I may or may not get into the few classes on this blasted list that are available because they will be oversubscribed and the University may deem that there are other more deserving students than I who are even more screwed over to get out of here in a reasonable number of years than I am right now.

I don't want to hear it. This isn't what I signed up for when I decided to come here. This place was supposed to be better than that. Go shit in your own hat, UMass, and pull it down over your ears.

Roommate horror stories:
Not easy to find the right fit

JAMIE LEE

Before I left for Spring Break I got the letter that many students on this campus fear. No, it's not the letter to pre-register or a preliminary schedule of the classes of what you didn't get during pre-registration. It was the letter from housing about room selection and roommate requests.

Every year I get the dreaded letter and scramble to find someone, anyone so that I can avoid the random lottery. My friends have experienced some real horror stories. Suzanne's roommate made a list of grievances against her and placed it in a sealed envelope on her desk after a month of school. She told Suzanne to read it and to do the same. One of my friends living in a single situation found out that her roommate was using her stuff.

Brad's first roommate had a set of shaving knives that he used to toss at the ceiling like fi in their dorm room at Bentley. In addition his roommate was a pothead and the campus dealer. "You know it shouldn't bother me that he smokes weed in the room. It's when he rolls the joints ON MY textbooks that bothers me ," he said.

Yikes. I've fucked out the past three years with having good roommates but I go to pray my luck will run out next year. The one time I did go through the random lottery was for my sophomore year. The housing assignments office must be a very boring place over the summer from some of the odd "coincidences" that happened.

For example excessive amounts of people with the same name living on the same floor. I was a part of one of those "coincidences" when I got paired with my roommate Jamie. I thought it was a joke when I called housing in the summer to get the name of my roommate. I kept insisting that I was Jamie and that I wanted the name of my roommate. It must have been tough for the person on the floor to hold back their laughter. Jamie wasn't the roommate I expected from the random lottery and turned out to be an awesome roommate. She's one of the most pleasant people I've met on campus. Alas, she decided to move to Central for a change of scenery.

I was trying to find a roommate turnover, or roommate murder statistic for you, the loyal reader. Instead I tumbled across www.collegeroommates.net. The website offers advice about campus living situations whether it's living on campus in a single or double or off campus in an apartment. Here are some pearls of wisdom that I pulled from them, along with my own thoughts.

Living off campus: When shopping for off-campus housing, make sure you concentrate on what's in your price range. Why waste your time looking at apartments you can't afford? Find out from students who are currently living in that apartment complex the pros and cons of living there. One of my friends has a pool table in her apartment that she hardly uses because every time she plays her neighbors complain about the noise.

Living in a suite: Be wary because multiple roommates can cause more problems. If you're nit-picks and already had trouble living with just one roommate, you may want to rethink living in a group situation. I think we've all heard enough stories from Sylvan to be wary of these situations.

Living in a single: Having at least one roommate is part of the college experience. In my opinion, there are very few advantages to having a single, besides having more space. Speaking from an SOM perspective, it's also good networking. Your roommate could end up being your best friend for life. Help you get your first job, or introduce you to your future spouse. It happens sometimes.

"If you find that you're continuously having problems with roommates, maybe the problem isn't them, but you. Maybe your attitude sucks."

And finally living with a roommate: It's human nature for us to pick out each other's flaws, instead of positive traits. No matter how bad your roommate situation is, remember that the sleeping monster across the room from you is also a person who has issues and problems. If you find that you're continuously having problems with roommates, maybe the problem isn't them, but you. Maybe your attitude sucks.

When all else fails, the web site also has a section for roommate war stories where you can vent by posting your personal stories. If you're crossing your fingers and entering the random lottery, don't read the postings! It will prey on your insecurities even more! If you're convinced your roommate is awful, though, you should read it and realize that it could always be worse.

Are you a female, and need a roommate in Orchard Hill? Mr. current roommate, Winnie is graduating in May and tells me that if she had the chance to do it all over again she would have lived with me sophomore and junior year too. This statement has probably been retracted now that Operation: April Fool's Day has taken place. It wasn't really that bad. I could have done worse things.

Never mind. I don't think I would want to live with anybody who took me seriously enough to respond. I think you would be the type to roll joints on my books.

Letters to the editor
Larkin and Busta

Dear editor:

I am writing in response to the column entitled "The Minister of Propaganda" by Mr. Bill Larkin, which appeared in The Collegian on April 3, 2002. In the article, Mr. Larkin utterly fails to give his readers a thorough and necessary recitation of the recent events surrounding the Middle East conflict. Not once does the author mention the various suicide bombings against Israelis, for which Palestinian terrorist factions have claimed responsibility, that have been occurring more frequently in the last few weeks. In Mr. Larkin's harsh critique of Ariel Sharon's current policy, it seems that it would be necessary for him to at least pay deference to the recent cruelty and barbarity of such acts.

However, Mr. Larkin instead puts forth the claim that Ariel Sharon has moved forward to "slaughter a defenseless people," without even taking one simple sentence to mention the suicide bombings that have killed innocent Israelis residing on the West Bank. Furthermore, Mr. Larkin alleges that Ariel Sharon is a "prized pupil" of President George W. Bush, taught by President Bush in his ways of gaining public support for "the most murderous campaigns imaginable."

First, it astounds me that Mr. Larkin would make such a claim given that no less than one year ago, he would have taken issue with President Bush's lack of foreign policy experience and knowledge. Now apparently, according to Mr. Larkin, President Bush is so well versed in foreign affairs that he is teaching Ariel Sharon about Israel's own domestic situation. Mr. Larkin further fails to acknowledge that, contrary to the ludicrous assertions within his column,

President Bush has endorsed the formation of a Palestinian state, and spoke out against the inability of Yasir Arafat to attend the recent Arab Summit. Mr. Larkin selectively challenges policies and global occurrences while often failing outright to acknowledge happenings that run perpendicular to his own beliefs. It is time for Mr. Larkin to get his head out of the sand and start writing opinion columns based in fact and not fictional rhetoric. As it stands now, Mr. Larkin challenges Ariel Sharon for being "the alpha artist of illusion" while his own articles contain more propaganda than reality.

Michael Gridley
UMass student

Dear editor:

This is in response to Eric Goodman's article entitled "Busta Threatening Violence Disheartening" in the March 26 edition of The Collegian. I also attended the Busta Rhymes concert on March 10 at Smith College. I would like to clear up a few statements in Eric Goodman's article. First of all, the quote from Busta Rhymes in regards to the March 10 concert is incorrect – the direct quote that was printed in the March 26 Collegian is NOT what Bust Rhymes said. Secondly, Busta Rhymes directed his comments to the general arena from whence the shouting came and did not single out anyone at "random," as was stated in Eric Goodman's article.

While I don not necessarily agree with Busta Rhymes' actions, I do understand why he responded in the way that he did. Within each of the many aspects of hip-hop there is an underlying code of respect. Those who are not familiar with this code of respect may find Busta Rhymes' seemingly extreme response difficult to comprehend.

The Notorious B.I.G. exemplified the American Dream, as a first-generation American raised in the inner city going on to become one of the most successful recording artists that hip-hop has ever seen. Throughout the history of hip-hop, MC's such as the Notorious B.I.G. and others have provide a voice for disadvantaged men, women, and youth in the inner city, and have even taken the role of father figure for many of us who were raised without one. Not only is the Notorious B.I.G. a prominent figure in hip-hop, he is also a prominent figure in American culture.

To not acknowledge a moment of silence dedicated to remembering one of our heroes is the most blatant form of disrespect. It is also important to understand that Busta Rhymes' angry response was driven by emotion, the same emotion most of us would feel if someone were to disrespect a close family member who was brutally murdered in the way in which the Notorious B.I.G. was.

While hip-hop is a temporary form of entertainment or rebellion for many, for the rest of us it is a state of mind, a state of being, a way of life. What we share is a common consciousness that allows us to rise above many of the harsh realities of urban life. Those of us who claim to be a part of the hip-hop community should focus on unifying, rather than condemning a brother like Busta Rhymes for what is a natural human response.

Bert and Ernie clarify depth of relationship

Is anything sacred anymore? No, not when Burt and Ernie are having their sexuality questioned. Such is the case in the independent film entitled Ernest and Bertram. The work spoofs the "Sesame Street" buddies Bert and Ernie, expressing that their relationship was more than platonic.

The film was screened at the Sundance Film Festival this past January. It includes Ernest shooting himself in the head following "a heated lovers spat with Bertram," according to zap2it.com.

Not surprisingly, The Children's Television Workshop, which produces "Sesame Street," is not pleased with the depiction. "We are unhappy with the film's content," said a spokesperson for the show. "Ernie and Bert are friends who live together. There's nothing sexual in their relationship." However, according to the website rainbowenvironment.com, Burt and Ernie behave "in the same discreet way that that millions of gay men, women and hand puppets do." Part of the explanation for their homosexuality is their "impeccably decorated cabinets."

This isn't the first time that various inanimate children's characters have been accused of being gay. In 1999, the Rev. Jerry Falwell accused "Teletubbies" character "Tinky Winky" of being homosexual, due to, as zap2it.com puts it, "his being purple, sporting the gay-pride symbol of a triangle on his head and carrying a purse." Of course, Falwell also blamed the September 11th terrorist attacks on gays, so what he says doesn't carry much weight.

Reality Television Update

Think that reality television has run its course? Not on MTV. The cable network, which has had success with such reality programs as "Real World," "Road Rules," "The Osbourne Family Show" and "Tough Enough," plans to unveil several new reality based shows over the next few months. Here's a rundown:

"Taildaters"- In the spirit of "Blind Date" and "Dismissed" comes this dating show. The premise of this one: a couple on a date is trailed by a pair of their friends. The friends keep a scorecard on the evening and offer advice to the daters. Premiers Saturday April 20th at 8:30pm.

"Virgin Chronicles"- Celebrities tell stories of their notable first times such as their first date, first kiss, first car and first sexual experience (often in the back of their first car). Also premiers on April 20th.

"Sorority Life"- A "Real World" type show chronicling the life of a sorority at a college in Northern California. Premiers on June 24th.

"I Bet You Will"- Contestants do crazy things for money. What a concept! Premiers on June 10th.

"Becoming Presents Wannabees"- MTV's super lame reality show "Becoming" gets a little bigger and a little lamer with this "spin off," in which contestants compete at the "MTV Beach House" for a chance to go on "Becoming." Also premiers on June 10th.

Contrary to rumors, there are no plans for a reality show chronicling the illicit sexual relationship between Cookie Monster and Oscar the Grouch.

DOWN
Down II
Elektra

Down is the greatest metal collabo, ever. GZR, Nailbomb, there have been attempts, successes and failures, but all pale in comparison to the grimy, soulful, primal force of five Southern metalheads.

Originally five dudes from Nawlins, LA: Phil, scion from Pantera, Pepper, guitarist from Corrosion of Conformity, Kirk and Todd, guitarist and bassist from Crowbar, and Jimmy, drummer from EYEHATEGOD, Down 2002 is the same save for the addition of Pantera's Rex Brown on bass, the sole member not from New Orleans.

Down's 1995 NOLA is in every way a metal classic. "Temptation's Wings," "Stone the Crow," "Bury Me In Smoke," every song on the album is perfect. The genius of the album is the way the different styles of all the members form the 'Down' sound. Phil screams just as hard as he does with Pantera, but tempers it other times to a soulful yelp as on "Rehab." Pepper would never bust out riffs as heavy with COC as he does when he's with Down, but being next to Phil and sludge-happy Crowbar members entices him to lay down something like "Losing All."

The other half of the 'Down' sound are the eternally hopeful lyrics, full of death, drugs, and general depravity, but recited with the clarity of a shrink's notes. "Crumbling world falls through my hands/ In my mouth taste bitter sands/ Grass is burning, pulse is slow/ Drip by drip my backwards growth" says "Pillars of Eternity," and like the rest of album the song finds, through drugs, confusion, hope, renewal, death...pretty much life through a darker (clearer?) lens.

Down II makes no attempt to alter the winning formula, although the album does spend a little more time on the heavy/mellow extremes than the middle ground occupied by its predecessor. "Where I'm Going" and "Landing on the Mountains of Meggido" are flat-out red-eyed, relaxed jam sessions, with the latter ending the album on a strikingly forceful and textured note of reflection and warning. Meanwhile, "The Seed" and "Ghosts Along the Mississippi" are among the heaviest material Down has released.

II has its share of surprises, too. "Stained Glass Cross" is a ridiculously funky romp that sounds like a Clutch outtake, 'cept for the death-obsessed lyrics. The superbly titled "New Orleans is a Dying Whore" also takes a stab at the history and politics of NOLA with the expectedly optimistic conclusion of "so broke it can't fix."

While not as immediately grabbing, the songs on II reveal themselves as not only a progression but also an expansion on the themes from the first album. Regret, confusion and anxiety towards the future rule the mood of the album. "Learn from this Mistake" is a deliberate cautionary tale about drug use ("there's no junkie out there with a happy ending"), while "The Man That Follows Hell" warns against an unknown evil ("I gave my life to this and it fooled me oh so well").

Down II doesn't have anything close to approaching a commercial hit and the fact that it mops the floor with nearly all of the new metal out there is as much a vindication of the band's persistent vision as it is an indictment of today's hollow, ephemeral commercial 'metal' scene.

Indie cred can only take Souljacker so far

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

EELS
Souljacker
Dreamworks

You can often tell a few things about an album just by looking at its cover art.

Look at the back cover of Souljacker, the new album from college rock favorites, Eels. The back is given almost entirely to an essay – nay, review – from one DJ Killingspree (who?), which continues in the little booklet inside. The essay, titled "Do You Like Rock Music?," pretty much proclaims Souljacker as the Second Coming, or at the very least the Greatest Rock Album Ever Recorded. I don't know if it was serious or a gag, but it certainly made me gag. DJ Killingspree can say whatever he wants about Souljacker – that's his right – but there's no need to reprint the whole damn thing on the CD. Including such an overwhelmingly positive review with the packaging smacks of self-congratulatory smarminess. It also has the terrible effect of setting up high expectations – if the Eels talk the talk, they had better walk the walk.

Well, that off-putting bit of literature (written in an amateurish, "yo, man, this shit's off the hook"-style) infects much of Souljacker. Eels may be singing their own praise (or have someone else do it for them), but they can live up to their own hyperbole.

Maybe the cockiness is just a front. Maybe lead singer Mark Everett, who goes by the name E (oh, how hip), is running scared. That's likely the case, as the Eels' hold on the throne of college radio friendly quirk-rock has become endangered, thanks to artists like the surprise platinum sellers Gorillaz. Everett (sorry, E) has got to be frightened of a band that's literally a cartoon (the creation of Blur frontman Damon Albarn, animator Jamie Hewlitt, and producer Dan "The Automator" Nakamura), and has gained attention for it's offbeat blend of hip-hop, pop, alt-rock, Latin rhythms and electronic. How else do you explain why Everett sounds like Albarn (who provides Gorillaz's vocals) and why the music sounds like the other band?

And while we're at it, why not mention the fact that Everett and Co. (including drummer/ percussionist Butch and all-purpose John Parish), are also cowering at the feet of retro rockers The Strokes. Numerous songs employ the same vocal distortion effect that's used on Is This It?, but do it ten fold. Whereas Julian Casablancas sounds like he's singing through a telephone, Everett sounds like he's singing through three fans. On tracks like "Teenage Witch" and "What Is This Note?," the choppiness makes it impossible to understand the music or lyrics. "Notes'" lyrics are actually a bit sweet, so why would Everett want to shred to pieces?

Mostly though, Eels ply their trade in non-mainstream alternative that sounds like Beck on downers. The best things about Souljacker are Everett's raspy, unobtrusive vocals and some musical tricks that actually work. The soft classical string arrangements and

PANIC ROOM
Starring Jodie Foster, Forrest Whittaker and Jared Leto
Directed by David Fincher
Playing at CineMark

In his latest suspense tale, Panic Room, director David Fincher pays tribute to the masters of the thriller genre, most obviously Alfred Hitchcock. This, of course, is deliberate, from the opening credits with Howard Shore's score resembling Bernard Herrmann's nerve-wracking Psycho theme. The storyline of the film, however, plays closer to Hitchcock's timeless work-of-art Rear Window (which was written by UMass alumnus John Michael Haynes). Much like James Stewart's character L.B. Jeffries in that film, the protagonist of Panic Room, Meg Altman (Foster), spends the duration of the film shut-in to a "panic room" in her Manhattan apartment; a highly protected, hidden chamber supposed to serve as sanctuary in the event of a break-in. Here, she and her daughter Sarah witness the dastardly doings of intruders in their house, voyeuristically resembling Window's wheelchair-bound main character that is witness to a murder outside of his window. Panic Room is not as entertaining as Rear Window, nor is it even close to being as haunting and thought provoking as Fincher's previous films Se7en and Fight Club, but it manages, at times, to be enjoyable — nothing more, nothing less.

The script, by David Koepp (screenwriter of the first Jurassic Park) has some clever moments, but overall relies too heavily on cliche and improbable situations. The three burglars are your average crew of cronies: Burnham (Whittaker), who has the nice-guy-underneath syndrome, stating "I don't want to hurt anyone" when he finds out that the house is occupied; Junior (Leto), the brains of the outfit despite having very little common sense; and Raoul (Dwight Yoakam), a shady character who doesn't care if a little blood is spilled in the process. Their goal is to get inside the panic room and extract a suitcase full of money hidden there, but for the Altman women to leave the safety of the hideaway would mean their death. While they are cowering in the panic room, the intruders are equally trapped in the apartment too, unable to leave because they have been caught on the house's many strategically placed video cameras. When, in fact, one of the thieves tries to get away, his cohort in crime shoots him in the head. For the extent of the film, it's a cat-and-mouse game between the Altmans and getting away with their lives, and the burglars getting away with that and the buried treasure.

There are only a few brief moments of unpredictable, nail-biting suspense that Koepp manages to create in the film, like when Meg leaves her tiny fortress in an attempt to get her cell-phone from underneath the mattress in her destroyed bedroom (the phone in the panic room has not yet been connected, of course). The film, overall, relies too heavily on past formulae for thrills, offering nothing new to the genre like Fincher's work has before. Such is the case when the Altman ladies find a flashlight and signal an S.O.S. through a drainpipe to their sleeping neighbor across the street. Can you guess what happens? After coming to the window and staring blankly at the stuttering light for a moment, he pulls down the shades and goes back to sleep. It's one of the oldest tricks in the book, and you see it a mile away. It's a surprise that both Fincher and Koepp cannot come up with more unusual and startling moments in Panic Room, instead weighing it down with such cliche gimmicks which compromise the dignity of the film.

Fincher's sharp eye at directing is mostly absent from the movie, with an interesting shot here and there, but disappointingly scarce. The camera flies through the apartyearning lyrics turn "Flesh Feeling" into a beautiful song, the high point of the album. "Friendly Ghost" is has sprightly as the Eels get, and, despite its title, "World of Shit" is a hopeful song.

But for every moment that works, there's another two that fail; moments that look good in theory but flounder in execution. The pairing of Bollywood musical influences and chunka guitars on "That's Not Really Funny" comes off as cutesy and insubstantial. "Souljacker (Part 1)" is the most mainstream track, as well the most frayed and washed-out, sticking to old tried-and-true alt-rock format of quiet verses, big choruses. And can someone please explain the lyrics behind the story song "Jungle Telegraph" in which a boy becomes a teen prostitute, kills a man (in self-defense), and moves to the African jungle to live?

In the end, Soulsucker is just another example of a below the-public-eye band that thinks its indie cred is good enough to let the band be too clever for its own good. Like many other acts that have fallen prey to this mindset, and have put out increasingly worse albums (i.e. Radiohead), Eels create a few decent songs, but have made an album that forgets what all music, at its core, is supposed to do: provide candy for the ear.

Really, dude. The beard. Come on. It's so last year.

ment, going through objects and walls, and this is nifty to watch, but doesn't really do anything other than speed up some dreadfully dull scenes. The final five minutes of the film are composed of a drawn-out camera shot which leads one to believe that there may be a twist about to be unfurled for the audience, but just dissolves into a closing scene which is unneeded and irrelevant. Perhaps there was an alternate, more staggering ending that will be released on the DVD in a few months from now, but Fincher's (and perhaps Koepp's) voice in the matter was lost, if that was the case, Panic Room is only a minor step up from Fincher's 1998 so-so thriller The Game, but a large step down from what he is coming to be expected to make.

Not even Hitchcock could knock audiences dead each and every time, but his trademark was always present. Panic Room will frighten and delight many moviegoers, which will make the studio that made it very happy, yet for other fans that are hoping to get more bang for the buck than an old-fashioned yarn, they may be less enthusiastic after seeing the final result.

Dear God Tart sucks

TART
Directed by Christina Wayne

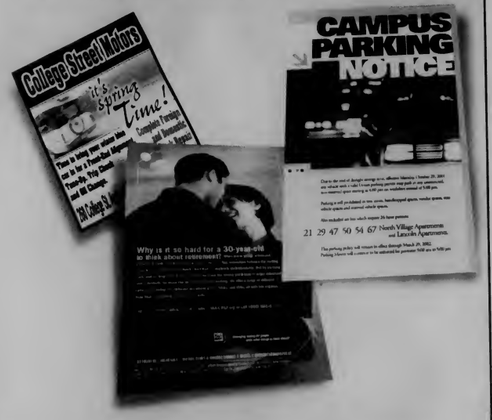
Coming soon to video from Trimark

If you want your movie to make it to the theaters, you better make it sure it has a rudder. I had the recent pleasure of viewing Tart, an aimless indie drama being sent direct to video in late April, about the young, rich and bored and Manhattan. It's coming courtesy of Trimark, the home to such classics as The St. Francisville Experiment and the Leprechaun series. After an endless 94 minutes, the characters weren't the only ones who were bored.



The package art is pure exploitation cheese, showing an up-skirt shot of a generic girl in a skimpy Catholic schoolgirl uniform. It seems designed to lure in more thuggish male viewers expecting a sex-driven trash classic. Instead, it's a serious character-driven drama, one as listless and motivated as a tree sloth. Frankly, I don't know what would've been worse – a degrading, dumb sex film I could have at least laughed at, or this self-important blub.

The story is like a defanged version of Cruel Intentions, or a Larry Clark film without the gratuitous overlay of over-the-top, shock-theater absurdism that marked Kids. Cat Storm (Dominique Swain) is an outcast with her punky friend Delilah (Bijou Phillips, who always seems to play the same role) at an all-girls prep school. Then one day, she's not very believably welcomed into the in-crowd. She begins to date handsome popular William (Brad Renfro, who apparently forgot his character was meant to be charming, popular and rich). Delilah begins to hate Cat's new ways and grows bitter. Cat discovers that the rich kids all like to drink, snort coke and steal (gee, what a surprise). At first happy, Cat begins to feel emptier inside after being shunted aside by her "friends" after having sex with William (gee, another surprise). Cat gets no help from her perpetually angry divorced mother, or her father (who seems to have no discerning characteristics except for the fact that he's keeping his Judaism a secret).

Writer/director Christina Wayne has so little clue about how to make a film that none of the relationships between seems remotely understandable. Characters float in and out with little connection to each; every scene the viewer needs to reestablish who everyone is in relation to one another. Hell, I couldn't even keep the names straight until the end. It doesn't help that the acting (and a lot of these young actors are actually talented) is one dimensional – the better to flesh out characters who barely have one dimension. The cinematography is ugly, full of flat, gray light that gives everything a dreary tone. The writing is depressingly forgettable. The pace drags on and on; nothing remotely interesting happens in the movie. This is two hours of my life I'm never getting back.

throughout the year. Add that quintet (UMBC, G-Town, Navy, Rutgers, Penn State) to the two high-end teams (Syracuse, Hofstra) and you've got seven legitimate games.

So that leaves seven spots left to fill in a 14-game schedule. Since UMass sits for the annual New England Championship, it is required to schedule regional teams like Harvard, Yale and Brown, which are all on it this year.

Now four slots remain for whomever Cannella sees fit to play. Stony Brook is an exception this season because they were a conference opponent but pulled out of the UCAC after schedules were finalized. So that leaves Hartford, Albany and Vermont, a triumvirate that is far from the lacrosse hierarchy.

If UMass was to replace one of the cake teams on its schedule with a known lacrosse powerhouse, then Cannella would have a more than adequate schedule to work with. But it isn't that simple. Finances are always an issue for a lacrosse program at UMass' level, but the negative factors do not end with the wallet.

"Virginia won't come here," Cannella says. "Last time we scheduled them they chartered a flight here and went home without playing a game because of the weather."

The cold-weather climate that dominates the first half of the lacrosse season in Amherst, which includes the meat of the non-conference slots, deters many of the southern powers (Towson, Maryland, Duke) from making a home and home deal with UMass.

"It's hard to have more than a couple overnight trips per year," Cannella says. "It would be one thing if we got a return trip from these teams, but we aren't going to go down there if they won't come here to play us."

But the negative feedback he's received from many coaches and the financial constraints he is forced to deal with have not deterred Cannella from trying to put more big-time teams on the schedule.

"I've looked into adding a Loyola or a Towson and they have been very receptive," Cannella said before the season opener. "But the way Athletic Director Bob Marcum and I looked at it was that if we changed the schedule after what happened last year, then we were admitting that the Tournament Committee was right — and they weren't."

Cannella does have a legitimate gripe that a 12-2 team, with two one-goal losses to top 10 teams as their only blemish, does deserve a shot at the playoffs. But the only thing that matters is how the Committee sees it, and Cannella doesn't need any ray of sunshine to make that clear to him.

Oft-awarded Softball hosts Maine

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts softball team squares off against Maine today for a doubleheader, and it's bringing some serious accolades with it.

Senior Teri Rooney and junior Kaila Holtz were named Player and Pitcher of the Week, respectively, for the Atlantic 10. Holtz earned the honor after pitching two shutouts against La Salle in consecutive starts. Her 1.24 ERA is second on the team, and in the conference, behind senior Jennifer Hadley. She leads the team in strikeouts, with 68. In the first of three games with the Explorers, Holtz went the distance, allowing only two hits with five strikeouts. In the final game of the trio, Holtz worked equally as well, with less run support. She let up three hits in seven innings of work, with seven strikeouts to finalize the sweep for the Minutewomen.

Rooney was the star on offense, and that helped UMass win the three games by a combined score of 20-0. With a .600 batting average for the series, Rooney also hit a double and a triple, and scored three runs. She also leads the team in hits (34) and triples (4), also the best three-bagger total in the A-10.

In a testament to the ever-focused Minutewomen, however, coach Elaine Sortino says it's unlikely that Holtz and Rooney even know that they've been tabbed as best in the conference.

"Whenever I announce that one of our players has gotten the award they just look around," Sortino said. "I think they're usually embarrassed."

Rooney and Holtz are leading a UMass squad that currently sits atop the conference standings, boasting a 6-0 conference record. Maine will be its first non-conference opponent since returning from an impressive week in Florida, two weeks ago.

The Black Bears will provide a different kind of challenge for the Maroon and White, which hasn't seen Maine in more than a few years.

"I don't really know what to expect, but that's the same thing we faced against Southern Illinois," Sortino said. The Minutewomen split the season series with the Salukis 1-1.

"We just have to play our game, play our style of softball," Sortino continued. "We're just looking to implement what we've been working on in practice these last few days."

In addition to Holtz, UMass has been blessed with impressive pitching from Hadley and freshman Kelli Arnold. Hadley leads the league in ERA (0.80), earned runs (10), and is tied for the lead in wins (9) with Holtz and St. Joseph's Dana Travis.

Arnold has come on as a poised and talented freshman, with a 1.48 ERA in seven appearances, allowing only six earned runs. She has also shown the ability to strike batters out, with 21 Ks on the season.

Arnold may see some action today in one of the two games.

"She hasn't pitched for a while, and it's important to get her out there, and get her throwing," Sortino said.

While the Minutewomen have played a number of doubleheaders this season, the contests tomorrow are somewhat unique in their scheduling. They're jammed right next to each other, with the first pitch of the first game coming at two o'clock, with the second game to follow a short time after the conclusion of the first.

"A doubleheader is a steady diet for a softball player," Sortino said. "It doesn't give you much time to grieve or celebrate, and it prepares you for postseason play, especially if you end up in a loser's bracket."

The Minutewomen have been rolling recently, currently riding a six game winning streak, but according to Sortino, all of that matters little for the contests ahead.

"We're so involved in implementing what we're doing, we haven't talked about our success and failure," she said. "We have a laundry list of things to get done, and that's what we need to work on. We're too busy navigating to look at all of the places we've already passed."

Very much in the style of this team, Rooney has not been left to handle all of the offense. Senior Scooter Wheeler leads the team in RBIs, with 17, and has also hit a team-high four home runs. Junior Emily Robustelli has crossed the plate 19 times, second only to Rooney, and has 24 hits with one home run to her credit. Junior Anna Perey has also provided some offense, boasting a .304 average and a 1.000 fielding percentage. The outfielder is just one member of a defense that currently holds a .956 fielding percentage, good for fourth in the A-10.

prepared for her but we did not execute as a team defensively," Barnes said.

She finished off her hat trick with 12:19 to play in the first half, converting a long pass from fellow senior Jenn Newitt to make the score 7-3 before adding three more after the intermission.

The Minutewomen will need to put the loss behind them and get themselves ready for Sunday afternoon's matchup with A-10 newcomer Richmond. The Spiders knocked off George Washington 18-5 in their inaugural conference showdown back on Mar. 19 and currently stand at 6-4 for the season.

"Everyone is going to look at [the tape] tonight and we're going to look at it tomorrow because this was a game that, one we could have won and two, should have won," Barnes said. "In hindsight we had a great opportunity to win this game and unfortunately we took a step backwards instead of a step forwards."

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Oo wee oo he looks just like Buddy Holly. The stars say take a lesson from this rock and roll pioneer and don't fly with other famous people.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Bah bah black sheep, have you any wool.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – I had a nut removed in Tomcats. Some people say we could have used a fake one, but hey, I'm a method actor. I sure do miss that ball, though.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Take a lesson from me, think before you make choices that could change your life (see also: "Shasta McNasty").
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Every so often I read in the horoscopes that my career will end in a horrible flaming failure. I've proved them all wrong though: look at Suspicious Minds.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – If a group of killer insects attacks the Earth, get your gun and join me to fight them off. Sure the only reason he did Star Troopers was to get closer to Denise Richards, but come on...he would really fight and so should you.

Dartmouth drowns UMass

Tale of two halves for Women's Lax

By Justin Pearson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It was the best of times; it was the worst of times.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team braved the elements but not the Dartmouth attack as the Minutewomen fell, 15-5, yesterday afternoon at Garber Field.

Dartmouth	15

Senior midfielder Alison Moulin scored a season high six goals while Ann Frazier added a pair of goals and three assists for the Big Green in the driving rain to snap the Maroon and White's two game winning streak and extend its own to three.

No. 14 Dartmouth (5-3, 2-1 Ivy League) outscored UMass 7-0 in the second half to break open what had been a tight contest for most of the opening 30 minutes. The Big Green led 8-3 with less than 10 minutes left in the opening stanza until Hope Zelinger and Tracey Drown struck back to make the score 8-5 when the two teams went into halftime.

Despite the Minutewomen (0-5, 3-0 Atlantic 10) heading into halftime on a high, it was Dartmouth who came out and grabbed control of the match in the second half. Sophomore Kate Killen scored her second of the game just 38 seconds after the restart while Whitney Jamison and Moulin added a pair of goals shortly after to make the score 11-5 in favor of the Big Green with 28 minutes to play and effectively write the game off as a contest.

"They didn't do anything differently [in the second half,]" said UMass Head Coach Phill Barnes following the loss. "We didn't come out and play in the second half, that's the bottom line. It wasn't about what they did, it was about what we didn't do."

Leslie Pollock opened the scoring for the Minutewomen just 3:01 into the contest with her ninth goal of the season to give them their only lead of the game. It would be short-lived, however, as Dartmouth scored three goals in the next three minutes to open up a 3-1 lead. Jen Newitt scored her 20th goal of the season off a pass from Frazier just 33 seconds after Pollock had put UMass ahead to level the score. She then returned the favor on the next two tallies, feeding Frazier on each to give Dartmouth a 3-1 lead.

"That three minute stretch was really disappointing," Barnes said, "It was good that we recovered from that, but we never quite got there again."

UMass was forced to use its timeout to try and stop the bleeding after Frazier had fired home her second, a tactic that paid off as the Minutewomen were able to regroup and level the score at 3-3.

Junior midfielder Lydia Robinson scored her team leading 18th goal of the season off a free position shot at the 8:33 mark to once again level the score line. Fellow junior Kelli Kurtz had made the score 3-2 just 1:02 prior to Robinson's tally by firing a shot past Dartmouth goalie Sarah Hughes' left post for her 10th goal of the season.

It was at this time that Moulin, a senior from Alexandria, Va. decided to take over. She came into the game with eight goals on the season but walked off the field with 14 as she scored a six times to tie a career high. Dartmouth's third leading scorer for the past two seasons, Moulin opened her scoring with a pair of goals just 2:26 apart shortly after UMass had tied the game.

Minutemen rained out

Baseball awaits Flyers

By Jesse Greenspan
COLLEGIAN STAFF

New England weather in the early spring can be quite fickle.

When the Massachusetts baseball team woke up yesterday morning, it seemed like a perfect day for baseball. The sun was shining bright, the temperatures hovered in the high 50s and there was only a slight breeze.

By the time the Minutemen traveled down to Fairfield, Conn. in order to take on the Stags at 3 p.m., however, the wind was blowing ferociously and freezing rain was coming down from the suddenly cloudy skies.

With the postponement, UMass remains at 7-12 (1-5 A-10) on the year and will spend the rest of the week preparing for a three-game home series with Dayton this upcoming weekend.

No makeup date has yet been set for the Fairfield game.

The Flyers will undoubtedly prove to be tough competition for the Maroon and White, as they have totaled a 15-7 record (5-1 A-10) on the season, good enough for third place in the Atlantic 10.

The Minutemen's 1-5 conference record, on the other hand, has them ahead of only lowly LaSalle (0-6) and tied with Fordham and St. Joseph's.

Senior DH/1B Shawn Bolinger has ignited the Dayton attack thus far, as he has posted a .385 average to along with six homers and 35 RBIs. These home run and RBI totals are more than double the amount of any other player on either the Flyer or Maroon and White rosters.

Bolinger has not done it alone, though, as junior outfielder Jim Beecher and senior P/IF Mike Kerins have also shined at the plate, posting averages of .426 and .379, respectively.

On the mound, Kerins (3.10 ERA) has also been a force, as he and fellow starting pitcher Mike Rolih (3.72 ERA) have combined for a 10-1 record. With the Flyers' game yesterday against Wright State also rained out, both of Dayton's aces will have had ample rest for this upcoming weekend.

This means that UMass can be assured of seeing Kerins and Rolih in two of the three contests.

For the Maroon and White, two pitchers have also outperformed the rest, as Jesse Santos (3-1, 2.79) and Brian Hourigan (1-1, 1.71) have both done quite well for Head Coach Mike Stone. However, once you get past those two seniors, the next best Minuteman pitcher (Mike Crane) has a lofty 3.00 ERA.

Number two starter Keith Doherty and number three starter Eric Chown have especially struggled, going a combined 1-6 with ERAs of 7.50 and 6.08 respectively.

At the plate, the UMass bats have not fared much better, although their team batting average of .253 has actually improved from the beginning of the year.

Aaron Senoz and Mike Athas have led the squad, with averages of .357 and .318, respectively.

Schedule penalty

NCAA precedent magnifies UMass' conference standings

By Matthew F. Sacco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Five days before the start of this lacrosse season, Greg Cannella leans back in his office chair as he prepares to eye his team's schedule.

The sun shone through the window behind him illuminates the list of adversaries, bringing light to the fact that only one insignificant change — Boston College out, Hartford in — has been made to the schedule that kept Cannella's 12-2 Minutemen out of last year's postseason.

In response to an area sports writer's musings about the relative weakness of the schedule and its similarities to that of last year's — only three top ten teams all season — Cannella fingers his paper from top (Hofstra on Feb. 23) to bottom (Rutgers on May 4), before firing back.

"We don't need any more good teams on the schedule," he says. "We have teams like Brown, Hofstra and Syracuse and our conference, with teams like Georgetown, Navy and UMBC, is one of the toughest in college lacrosse."

Unfortunately for Cannella, many of the schools he mentioned played mediocre lacrosse last year, and much of the same is expected of them this season, making UMass' upcoming ECAC clash with the Retrievers all the more crucial.

This season, with UMass already in the hole to one quality opponent, the precedent that the NCAA Tournament Committee set last season marks down the UMass schedule to a pair of critical contests – Georgetown and Syracuse.

After Hofstra, the Hoyas and Orangemen are the only top ten teams left on UMass' schedule. Last year the Minutemen swallowed one-goal losses at home to both teams, their only setbacks of the season. But the Committee still refused them, holding fast to their postseason credentials and proving their stinginess.

It will likely take another 12-win season, coupled with a win over Syracuse in the Carrier Dome to garner an at-large bid, a scenario that looks unlikely with a 21 game losing streak to 'Cuse, who at this point in the season is looking strong as the second ranked team in the country.

But then there is the ECAC.

The fastest road to the NCAA tournament is through an automatic qualifier and luckily for the Minutemen they reside in a very surmountable league. A 13-12 loss to G-town was the only thing that kept UMass from an AQ last year and that same Hoya squad is predicted to be the only major block on the ECAC road this season as well.

Chance for redemption? Maybe.

The Minutemen go to G-town on April 20 in a game that will likely decide who goes to the Tournament and who makes a tee time.

If UMass does not take the ECAC title, then it could conceivably win 11 games and be left out of the field again. Cannella and his squad find themselves in this situation for one simple reason — scheduling. In the Committee's eyes, UMass needs more games, and wins for that matter, against quality top ten opponents to establish it as a legit tourney contender. Right now the Minutemen don't have that type of schedule, but that isn't necessarily something Cannella can control.

The Minutemen play in a six-team conference, the ECAC, which requires UMass play five in-league games

Second American discovered among detainees

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT

Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs Victoria Clarke announced that a Guantanamo detainee was actually an American citizen.

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Pentagon announced that an American citizen is among the detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba yesterday.

Assistant secretary of Defense for Public Affairs Victoria Clarke told reporters that Yasser Esam Hamdi, age 22, was born in Baton Rouge, La. and moved to his parents' native Saudi Arabia when he was a toddler.

"We are working with the Department of Justice to really determine all the particulars, including his citizenship. They have a birth certificate that indicates he was born in the United States," Clarke said. "It's our understanding that his parents were employed in Louisiana when he was born and returned to Saudi Arabia within a very few years."

Hamdi was captured during the November 2001 prison uprising by Taliban fighters near Mazar-e Sharif. Another American citizen, John Walker Lindh, was also captured in that area. Walker currently faces criminal charges for alleged crimes against the United States. There is no word yet on charges, if any, against Hamdi. As an American citizen, Hamdi cannot be tried by a military commission.

"I think it's way too soon to speculate on what he may or may not be charged with," Clarke said. "People started to ask us, 'What's the significance of this? What are you going to do with him?' A lot of these things will be worked through, but it does just point to how unconventional this war is in many ways."

"We're really working through with the Department of Justice right now what we'll do with him next," Clarke added.

Clarke declined to comment on Abu Zubaydah, captured by American forces in Pakistan on March 28.

"We're just not going beyond what we have said about him," Clarke said. "For security reasons, for lots of reasons, we're just not going beyond what we said about him."

Pakistani and American forces raided several compounds, and Zubaydah was located at one of them. He was shot three times while attempting to escape. Zubaydah is in serious, but "not life threatening" condition, in an undisclosed location according to Defense department statements.

"We, the United States government, have made a conscious decision not to release his location, as a matter of security," Donald Rumsfeld, the secretary of Defense, said in a press briefing. "Second, the United States is providing him appropriate medical attention. We have every interest in seeing that he remains alive and has an opportunity to discuss a variety of things with us that conceivably could be helpful to the global war on terrorism."

Zubaydah is described as a close associate of al Qaeda terror network leader Osama bin Laden. Zubaydah is believed to be al Qaeda's "number two guy," according to Rumsfeld. White House press secretary Ari Fleischer said that Zubaydah was a "a key terrorist recruiter, an operational planner, and a member of Osama bin Laden's inner circle.

"This represents a very significant blow to al Qaeda," Fleischer said in a released statement.

Air Force Brig. Gen. John W. Rosa, Jr., deputy director for current operations for the Joint Staff, gave an operational update during a Pentagon press briefing. Rosa said the "mopping up" of al Qaeda fighters following the March ground offensive, titled Operation Anaconda, continues.

"Over the last week to 10 days, we continue intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance over [a] majority of the country. As before, we're focusing the main effort in the East, in that Gardez, Khost area. We've got several forces on the ground doing surveillance, gathering intelligence," Rosa said. "We're still finishing up the last remnants, the last part of the forces — or the caves in Anaconda — in that area. But right now, it's a lot of reconnaissance, intelligence."

Author describes Joan of Arc's life as strong role model for women

By Melissa Hamme!
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Author Mary Gordon spoke on the life of Joan of Arc yesterday at an event sponsored by the Massachusetts Center for Renaissance Studies.

Gordon addressed the 30 person crowd gathered at Memorial Hall explaining that much of her work was not planned out but instead simply came to her like the decision to undertake a biography on Joan of Arc.

She explained that she struggled with balancing a biography on Joan that was fact based with something that also told a story.

"I look at some of the biographies, and it seemed to me that in themselves, they were a sort of literary form," she said. "But I had to be sure that I was saying something that really happened."

When Gordon was approached to write a biography, she explained that she immediately chose Joan as her subject, because as many other women, she had admired her since childhood.

"A lot of women thought an enormous amount of Joan of Arc," she explained. "She was the model for a life of action for girls who wanted to be out in the world 'kicking butt.' She is really an inspiring model; there is no one like her."

The side of Joan that she chose to portray, Gordon explained, was one of youth and that of her religious and virginal power.

"What I was interested in was how young she was," Gordon said. "She was 17 when she led an army and 19 when she died. I focused upon her as an adolescent."

Reading from her book, Gordon expressed the importance of the impact that Joan's virginity and spirituality had upon the men she led, and the need to destroy her body was in part one of the reasons for her death at the stake. However, even though her body was destroyed, there were still myths that her heart could not be burned.

"Her charred body was displayed so that everyone could walk in front of it and ascertain that she was actually a woman. What was it about her that made men want to destroy her body and maintain her image?" she asked. "On the fate of Joan's inconsumable heart, we have no word."

How she managed to get male soldiers to follow her in a time in which that was unheard of was also a major issue that Gordon addressed.

"It is only explicable through charisma," she said going on to explain that there was a myth that a woman would lead the French army to sovereignty, which assisted her. "There was a tale of a woman who would walk out and would lead France. The myth had been there for a very long time, and she filled it.

"Her period of success was very short, but for that time, a few men followed her. It hasn't happened again in history."

In addition to her biography on Joan of Arc, Gordon has also wrote a number of prize-winning novels and short stories including The Company of Women, Men and Angels, The Other Side and Spending. She is currently a professor of English at Barnard College.

Following her lecture, Provost Charlena Seymour awarded Gordon the Renaissance Center Medal for promoting and furthering the mission of Renaissance studies.

This lecture is part of a series honoring the life of O.B. Hardison, an international authority on Shakespeare and a former professor of Georgetown University.

There will be another related lecture held today at 2 p.m. in Herter 301. Professor Sherry Velasco of the University of Kentucky will be speaking on historic women similar to Joan of Arc. Her lecture will focus upon Lieutenant Catalina de Erauso.

Military investigates friendly fire incidents, accidental air attacks

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The military is investigating several incidents for possible wrongdoing during Operation Enduring Freedom. Among them is the March 2 attack on U.S. troops, possibly by an American warplane.

A convoy of U.S. soldiers and Afghan allies came under fire, killing a Special Forces soldier. A U.S. AC-130 gunship reported engaging a convoy at approximately the same time during Operation Anaconda, the recent ground offensive in eastern Afghanistan.

Gen. Tommy Franks is the commander in chief of U.S. Central Command, which is currently engaged in the U.S.-led coalition effort against terrorism in Afghanistan.

"I noticed on the second of March was that, as Operation Anaconda kicked off and the forces were moving into position, there was reporting of one of our convoys, a friendly convoy of Americans and Afghans, being under fire. Simultaneously, on a different radio network, I noticed reporting by an AC-130 gunship that it was engaging a convoy," Franks said in a press briefing. "I put the two things together and said, 'Okay, what we need to do is we need to find out the facts associated with that.' And so I've asked our Special Operations component to investigate the facts and circumstances and see if there is any connection between the two."

The military is also investigated the March 6 attack on a suspected al Qaeda leader's vehicle that resulted in 14 deaths and one person wounded. Eight men, three women and three children were killed in the attack near Shikin, Afghanistan. The investigation is not yet complete, Central Command said.

The bombing of an International Committee of the Red Cross compound outside of Kabul on Oct. 16, 2001 was the result of the ICRC not transmitting the coordinates of the warehouse to the military in time. The military said the compound had a long association with the Afghan military. The coordinates were received after the attack, Central Command said, but the area was bombed again on Oct. 26. The matter is now in the hands of the Air Force for further review.

The Air Force is also reviewing the Dec. 6 bombing of friendly forces near Sayd Alim Kalay, Afghanistan. Three soldiers were killed and 20 wounded in this incident.

In November of 2001, Central Command learned that a United Nations relief convoy "had suffered damage from aerial bombardment while traveling to Bamian, Afghanistan." Central Command investigated and determined that the convoy was not the target of the strike.

"The inquiry determined that the convoy was not the target of a strike. Rather, high altitude bombers were striking steep cliffs alongside a road in order to block the route to enemy forces. Additionally, the inquiry disclosed that the UN convoy was not traveling on the days for which it had requested and received clearance," the report reads. "The coalition had no reason to suspect the presence of the UN convoy nor was the convoy visible to the bombers. The convoy was struck by flying debris."

No one was killed or injured in the incident, which the military considers closed. The UN opened a new relief route the next day.

Two November friendly-fire incidents are also under investigation. Five American soldiers were injured when a Navy aircraft dropped a bomb close to their position near Mazar-e Sharif on Nov. 26. While the investigation is not finished, the military says it has already found errors in the way that "friendly and enemy coordinates" were transmitted. A Navy Special Warfare Group came under fire from U.S. Army helicopters on Nov. 28. No one was injured or killed, and the investigation is closed.

"Communications and identification procedures were changed to prevent a reoccurrence," the report stated.

The military found no procedural errors in the Jan. 23, 2002 raids on two complexes near Hazar Qadam, which killed 16 possibly innocent people.

"Fourteen personnel at one compound and two at the other were killed. One U.S. person was injured," the report stated. The military took 27 prisoners, who were later determined to be "friendly Afghans."

"That investigation did not substantiate that the compounds at Hazar Qadam were, at the time of the direct action mission, being used by al Qaeda/Taliban," the report commented. "Nevertheless, the investigation concluded that there were no systemic errors in the targeting process, mission planning or mission execution. This incident is closed."

Filing procedures for detainees was changed after an inmate at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba base reported that he had been beaten by guards while being held in Khandahar, Afghanistan.

"The investigation found that the detainee, while at Khandahar, struggled and fought with his guards and was injured during efforts to gain control of him. The detainee was seen immediately by medical personnel at Khandahar and a report of the incident prepared," the investigation stated. "That report, however, was inadvertently omitted from the file that was forwarded to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Corrective measures to ensure proper forwarding of documentation were instituted."

South Florida faces backlash

By Grace Agostin
The Oracle (U. South Florida)

(U-WIRE) TAMPA, Fla. — Anthrax scares left citizens suspicious of their mail and the economy's downfall had them watching their budgets.

Both had a small effect on the University of South Florida's donations, as well, said Vicki Mitchell, associate vice president for USF Foundations, the office responsible for raising money for the university.

Mitchell said the controversial issue with tenured professor Sami Al-Arian isn't, however, a large part of that equation. She said Al-Arian's case could not fully be blamed for the decrease in direct mail donations and alumni renewal rates.

"We had an impact felt, but the magnitude of impact was created by reporters who don't understand fund raising," Mitchell said. "No major donor declined a gift or failed to pay a pledge."

Mitchell said direct mail was affected, because they had to hold donation requests that were scheduled to be mailed after Sept. 11.

Mitchell said after Al-Arian's Sept. 26 appearance on The O'Reilly Factor, USF's telefund received some phone calls from alumni who expressed disappointment and asked questions about the situation. Mitchell said some alumni called to say they would not contribute this year, and mail requests for donations were returned, as well.

"You would assume gifts decline and that fund raising overall is down, but telefunds and direct mail account for one percent of the total (donations)," Mitchell said. "We have had donors with questions, but reporters have extrapolated this into a much larger story."

Mitchell said money donated to USF was not significantly affected and has increased since last year.

Mitchell said last year's donations were about $22 million, and now the donations are about $28 million, with about three months left in the fiscal year. Donations generally made from alumni or businesses include stocks, property and funds collected from the telefund and direct mail, which go toward scholarships, facilities and research programs.

Mitchell said those who chose not to give money to the University this year could not be blamed on only the controversy with Al-Arian.

There was feedback from alumni to the dismissal of Al-Arian from both sides, said Lisa Lewis, associate vice president and executive director for USF's Alumni Association.

"Just like in a community, there are different views," Lewis said. "The alumni have responded more to this issue than any other issue in 12 years."

Lewis said there were about a handful of people who said they were never going to be a member again, and some said they were going to take their degree off their walls.

Lewis said the renewal rate two years ago was 82 percent, and at the end of 2001, the rate had dropped to 68 percent.

"Some is due to (Al-Arian), but not that much," Lewis said. "When Sept. 11 hit, people predicted the economy would go down, and that affects membership."

Students sink deep in credit debt

By Annie Grow & Jason Gifford
The Daily Universe (Brigham Young U.)

(U-WIRE) PROVO, Utah — College students are reaching for their wallets and pulling for the plastic. It's easy access to endless amounts of money and fun... until the bill comes.

Ten percent of college students have credit card debts of more than $7,000, said Steve Albrecht, associate dean of the Marriott School of Management at Brigham Young University.

This trend is similar to that of families in America.

The average American family has ten credit cards and owes an average of $7,000 to credit card companies, Albrecht said.

"Almost half of the households in America report having difficulty paying their minimum monthly payment, thus making bankruptcy seem like a good alternative," Albrecht said.

With a credit card balance of $8,000 and making the minimum monthly payment at the average 18.9 percent interest, it will take 25 years and seven months to pay the debt off. Interest charges will reach $15,432, bringing the total payment to $23,432, Albrecht said.

In 2001, Americans paid $65 billion in interest charges alone, and the number of people filing for bankruptcy reached 1.3 million, the highest mark ever.

The number of people under the age of 26 that filed for bankruptcy tripled between 1995 and 2000, Albrecht said.

Leaders of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints continually urge church members to get out of debt and stay out of debt. President Gordon B. Hinckley, addressing members in October 1998, urged them to get their houses in order and pay off debt.

"I urge you to be modest in your expenditures: discipline yourselves in your purchases to avoid debt to the extent possible," Hinckley said. "Pay off debt as quickly as you can... That's all I have to say about it, but I wish to say it with all the emphasis of which I am capable."

Michael Wadman, 22, a junior from Layton, Davis County, majoring in computer science, owns two credit cards.

"I got the cards a year ago to begin establishing credit," Wadman said. "I have flawless credit. My parents and President Hinckley have said to stay out of debt."

Wadman says that students should avoid spending more than they have.

"They shouldn't put any more on credit than they have in the bank," Wadman said.

Albrecht believes that establishing good credit is important for students.

"You need to get a credit card, you need to use it for small things, but you need to pay it currently instead of paying interest," Albrecht said. "Everybody should establish good credit, but I would not pay interest on a credit card to do it."

Limiting responsibility for sexual abusers

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS – As a new wave of sexual abuse allegations against priests shakes churches nationwide, Minnesota law continues to hamper victims. Several decisions by the state Supreme Court and Court of Appeals have placed an overly restrictive burden on victims to bring their cases within the statute of limitations or lose their rights to sue at all. A bill currently before the Legislature takes a more reasonable view of the typical victim's circumstances, but its proposal should go further in providing useful legal protection.

The state's courts have ruled that Minnesota's six-year time limit on sexual abuse claims begins to run when a "reasonable person" in the victim's position "knew or should have known" he or she was abused. But when a victim's parents and religion label the abuser as trustworthy beyond reproach, the victim deserves more than six years to deal with the emotional fallout, consult their lawyers and piece their cases together.

The statute of limitations is designed to prevent things like victims of a breached contract lying in wait until an opportune moment to sue the offender. It is inappropriately applied when it strips away, by the victim's mid-20s, the right to sue for an intensely personal violation. The same person the courts say should "reasonably" realize by the age of sexual maturity he or she was abused is subject to a variety of unreasonable forces that make this type of suit difficult to present.

Legislators in both parties are sponsoring a bill to delay the beginning of the statute of limitations period, but although this action is a step in the right direction, it will only replace one legal complication with another. The more useful solution is to entirely repeal the statute of limitations for sexual abuse by priests and perhaps others, such as teachers, in similar positions.

The legislature should stamp trusted adults' sexual abuse of children with an infamy similar to murder, which our laws have long held is so heinous the offender should never become immune to accountability. Such a law would show compassion for victims and put offenders on notice that they can be held responsible whenever a victim can put a case together.

At the same time, the legislature should keep the statute of limitations for religious organizations and schools boards. Extending the period of liability for these institutions, rather than the individual perpetrator, would encourage them to cover up evidence of abuse. Keeping the statute of limitations allies the institutions with the government and the victim against the person ultimately responsible.

The passage of years since the offense might mitigate the appropriate punishment for a sexual abuser, but it should never be allowed to remove the offender's culpability. Victims carry the memories of abuse their entire lives; they deserve one day in court to hear a just judgment pronounced.

O little town...

YOUSEF MUNAYYER

I remember only a few years ago walking in the streets of Bethlehem. I remember visiting the church of the nativity and kneeling beside the spot where Christ came into this world and praying. I remember the gentle breeze that flowed through the hills of the city and rustled the fig tree's leaves. But most of all, I remember the serenity.

I can only remember now how it was. The serenity is surely gone. The church in which I said my prayers that day is now filled with children who scream and mothers who cry. Soldiers now patrol the streets that I had walked on. The breeze now blows up against the turrets of unmoving tanks. And the serenity that made Bethlehem so sacred has disappeared.

It is time for action to be taken. The Palestinian population is under siege, not from suicide bombers but from apache helicopters, F-16s, tanks and possibly the world's best-trained army. The bloodshed is overflowing in the lands of milk and honey. The Arab hospitals are burying their dead in the parking lots outside, because their morgues are overflowing. A population that has endured so much is now being tested again by a brutal onslaught against the infrastructure of a state being developed in the dreams of its inhabitants.

Ariel Sharon is waging war. He has neglected the United Nations, again, and he has ignored the European Union. The United States has turned its cheek yet again. It is time for the Zinnis, Tenets, Mitchels and the like to get out and stay out of the Middle East. It is time to hand the mediation to be handed to the Europeans. The United States has shown that it cannot broker a peace deal impartially.

The only time anything significantly good came out of negotiations was through Oslo. All the photo opportunities with Clinton and handshakes before flashing cameras have done nothing. President Bush hasn't even done anything yet. The Holy Land needs a King Solomon, not a Pontius Pilot. If the United States still wants to feed the blood hungry Israeli occupation machine with aid and weapons, it has the right, but it is not fair to the Palestinians for the United States to toy with the process.

Cease-fires have proven to be useless. Palestinian factions will not cease from attacks until the Israelis completely withdraw from the occupied territories, and the Israelis will not stop incursions until the factions halt their attacks.

The plans that the United States has tried to carry out have led to what we have today. The only way for this violence to stop is for the top leaders of both countries to meet together under European supervision in secret and to come out and announce a settlement once and for all. All of the meeting with "top aids" and "top advisors" are nonsense.

The very first step is the halting of the offensive by the Israelis before it becomes a regional war. Then Israel must recognize Arafat as the head negotiator for the Palestinians. Exile is nonsense, and everyone knows that. Arafat is not a terrorist; in fact, if the world needs to be reminded, he is a noble peace laureate. Many have called for a different person to lead the Palestinian people, but this is not the right thing to do. Arafat has been with his people since the beginning. He has fought relentlessly with a gun and with diplomacy. He has survived plane crashes and assassination attempts. He is recognized by the world as the leader of the Palestinian people, and any attempts by the Sharon government to de-legitimize him are underhanded, unnecessary and are only going to further put the peace process off track.

Once Arafat is treated as a partner, the two leaders must begin to talk about major issues like the right of return and the displaced Palestinians from 1948. These important issues must be dealt with, not only to achieve peace, but for justice. The Palestinians are fighting as they are because they have been treated unjustly. This must be recognized and corrected.

Sharon must be willing to do this, and if he truly wants the best for the safety of his people, he will not hesitate because it is the only way out. Violence only begets violence, and Sharon, a former war general, should know this.

Sharon must be willing to set aside whatever hatred he has for Arafat or the Palestinians and must be willing to work this out diplomatically with no conditions. He cannot expect to be taken seriously if he makes comments to Israeli newspapers saying he wished he had "liquidated" Arafat when he had the chance. If Sharon, an ageing war general who ran on the platform of providing security for his people only to bring them the worst violence the nation has every witnessed, wants to be remembered as a man who did good for his people, he cannot do this behind a tank, only behind a table.

As for Bethlehem, I can only hope that one day I can return to you and once again pray in your churches and witness your serenity. There will come a day when we will all pray together in ye O little town.

Letters to the editor: languages and Palestine

To the editor:

Sam Wilkinson clearly has une montagne dans le Cerveau (a mountain in the heart," as the French say when it comes to learning French. He wants to know "why a country cannot be dissected or understood without the knowledge of a language" and why he finds himself "struggling through a study of something distinctly European when my interest is in Africa."

It is of course entirely true that the French language established itself in Africa as a result of French and Belgian colonialism. But the process of decolonization during the 1950s and 60s did not result in a series of independent states that relinquished the use of French. In most of them it still holds official or co-official status. In other words, many of these states use French to communicate with each other and, perhaps more importantly, in international bodies such as the United Nations.

If Wilkinson is intending to make a lifelong interest out of Africa, he may well want to learn one or many African languages, but French would certainly provide him with an opportunity to learn more directly about a wide range of African realities. To mention only two examples: the graphic, eyewitness testimony of the genocide in Rwanda (a former Belgian colony) was communicated to the rest of the world largely in French, and there is an incomparably greater range of information available in French (as opposed to English) about the ongoing tension in Algeria.

But there are two other important issues. Wilkinson claims that to study French when he is interested in Africa "is akin to learning German to understand the Holocaust." In fact, a scholar of the Holocaust would most probably want to learn German, not least because some of the most eloquent anti-Nazi and anti-militarist works were written in that language. Beyond that, learning German is no doubt a good thing for someone interested in modern Jewish philosophy, since so much of it has been written in German (a fact the Nazis abhorred).

Getting back to French, it was the language used by many of the most important opponents of French colonialism including Frantz Fanon, Aime Césaire, Jacques Berque, and Albert Memmi. Their writings have contributed greatly to struggles against colonialism, imperialism and racism. There is also an entire literature from Africa – poetry, novels, drama – written in French but in ways that often play with, and subvert, classical or traditional French forms and meanings. In other words, Africans have made French their own and continue to do so. This writing is some of the most widely read in French today.

French is far from "distinctly European." The courses offered by my department look at the cultures, literatures and cinemas of French speakers, not only in Europe, but also in Africa, the Caribbean, Asia, and Canada. Just two hundred miles north of Amherst is Quebec, where 85 percent of the population are native French speakers. Among them, there are many immigrants from other countries where French is spoken including Morocco, Tunisia, Senegal, Cameroon, Lebanon, and... France! If Wilkinson had enrolled in our intensive elementary French course (126) instead of French 310, he would have benefited from weekly lectures – many of them by invited guests – on the role of French in a variety of societies, including African ones. If he were able to develop his skills in French just a little, he could go on to take French 247, "French for Social Sciences," a course which emphasizes reading ability in French for someone in his field.

Over the past several years, French textbooks have been integrating material on Africa into their lessons. Wilkinson's article reminds us that such material is still too often insufficient or left to the later chapters. But Wilkinson's confession that he has difficulty with all foreign languages poses a broader question: How is it that, for Europeans and Africans, the capacity to use two, three or even several languages is mastered in childhood and in schools, but that this seems so very difficult for Americans?

We at the University "inherit" this problem, but we also try and come up with attractive ways to compensate for it: a range of courses that develop reading skills in various disciplines; intensive courses that include work in small groups to help students improve their skills quickly; a French language suite where students can live in a French-speaking atmosphere, go on trips to Quebec and organize other social and cultural activities; our program in Paris, where you can study for a semester or a full year at pretty much the same cost as in Amherst. And as I said earlier, we also offer courses on the literatures, cinemas and cultures of French-speaking Africa, the Caribbean and Canada. Indeed, we were doing this long before most other American universities. I would like to believe that the steady increase in the number of French and Francophone Studies majors over the past few years means that we are on the right track.

Wilkinson ought not to use the role of French in colonialism as an excuse for his difficulties. After all, he has the immense privilege of speaking English, which is without doubt today's global language par excellence. Yet, like French (or any other language), English has no privileged "essence," even though it is implicated in many global inequalities that Wilkinson might well deplore. Languages are no one's property, which means that they can introduce us to intellectual traditions that critique and even defy the oppression or exploitation with which they appear complicit.

By learning new languages, we willingly challenge the frontiers of thought and imagination that our native tongues provide for us. Frontiers we take for granted and that appear so natural to us. In other words, knowledge of a foreign language is helpful in "dissecting" (Wilkinson's word) not only another culture, but also one's own. This is the opportunity we seek to provide at UMass through our programs in foreign languages.

To the editor:

In this world of cliches, the "war on terrorism" unfortunately is ongoing, and with an administration such as the one Arafat produced, terror is a job and Israel its workplace. What does one expect from Sharon? He has every right to defend his nation. After every cease-fire agreement Arafat has broken and after every false word Arafat has uttered, the Prime Minister of Israel has the right to defend his people. Perhaps it has not been done with the tact of a clear-thinking government, but following several suicide bombings, what type of government would send a dove through Arafat's office window?

As opposed to Mr. Larkin's ideas in his editorial "The Minister of Propaganda," Sharon is not lying to his people, nor is he giving propaganda to the world. This may be the first case in history where there are two truths, and Sharon has his, which is more credible than the Palestinian leaders. The rhetoric of Sharon may not radiate what the peace activists all over the world would like to see. It may not be the sort of peace the many residence of Amherst would like to see. And it may not be the sort of peace the governments of Arab nations would like to see, but it is more peaceful than funding suicide bombers to blow themselves up along with others at a hotel during Passover Seder.

Though we do not agree with every policy Israel has made or carried out, the idea of securing a nation and its people holds more weight than any rebuttal we could hear. Some of the Arab leaders at the summit in Beirut had been televised condemning suicide bombings, but going on to say basically how Israel deserves it as murderous occupiers. We get the impression that when some (at least Hamas and the al-Aqsa brigade) say they want a Palestinian state, they really want a state in place of Israel, rather than a dual state solution. A Palestinian state, in our opinion, should be created as soon as possible, as long as it does not pose major threat to Israel's security and existence. An outstanding fear as of today is the fact of the terrorist organizations that will not cease to terrorize Israel. There is also the fear of no more negotiations for "land for peace" with the creation of their own state.

A Palestinian genocide is easy to believe in a century where the term 'genocide' is thrown about without reason. The Israeli government is not committing genocide onto the Palestinian people. Sharon may be forceful in his way to secure his nation, but he is doing what any other nation would do, including the United States. He should be accused of defending his people, but not of genocide. The fact that the Palestinians are crying out against their oppressors, Israel, is a shame. Arafat has never demonstrated true leadership in helping his people before, making him an oppressor and a failed leader. The Palestinian Authority receives millions of dollars from the United States, European Union and even Israel. If they used this money to improve the way of Palestinian life, they would have flourished a long time ago. Instead, Arafat and the Palestinian Authority use a good portion of the money to purchase a shipload of illegal weapons from Iran to further expand their terrorist campaign.

To quote Mr. Larkin on a final note, "How can Israel hope to assimilate Muslims into a land of synagogues?" Israel is a Jewish state. However, it is not a "land of synagogues." There is quite a large population of Arabs, Christians, Druze, Bedouins, and other peoples, some of which make up a certain percentage of the Israeli Parliament. There are mosques and churches as well. Israel is a democracy in which it treats each minority equally, where each minority has a say in government. Palestinians do need a separate home from Israel but would not be criticized for their religious beliefs if they were in Israel. If one does not pray at the synagogue on the corner, they could simply walk down the street to the church or across the way to the mosque.

You are the "ultimate wordsmith," Mr. Larkin. Otherwise, why would you spend so much energy writing your editorial?

Hip-hop: beats, sticky sampling

Hip-hop music has been and forever will be based on the break-beat. The use of the break-beat became popular during the seventies when groups such as Sly and the Family Stone would incorporate complete instrumental breakdowns in their songs, which gave their band members some time to showcase their skills on their particular instrument.

Then as hip-hop came along at the end of the seventies, DJ's would loop these catchy break-beats using two turntables and a mixer, eventually giving way to what would be known as sampling.

Sampling became a staple of rap music production ever since its first hit single, "Rapper's Delight," by the Sugarhill Gang was released in 1979. The trio from New Jersey rapped over a looped instrumental break from Chic's "Good Times" song, which paved the way for how rap music was produced.

From the time period right after the Sugarhill Gang released their single until about 1991, hip-hop producers basically had free range to take any pre-recorded sound and manipulate it to create an instrumental track for their artists to rap over. Rap music was so new and inventive that no one ever thought that royalties should be owed to those artists whom the producers were sampling from. Groups such as the Beastie Boys, Run DMC and Public Enemy were sampling from a variety of different music genres and never really thought twice about having to repay the artists for using their work.

Then in 1991, the way rap producers sampled music was forever changed when Gilbert O'Sullivan sued Biz Markie for sampling his 1972 song "Alone Again (Naturally)" to make his own song "Alone Again." The US Attorney's Office came to the decision that unlicensed sampling was a crime and that Biz was forced to pay a fee to O'Sullivan for the rights to use the song.

The problem with charging rap artists a fee for sampling is that sampling is what rap music is based upon and charging them is basically limiting their ability to create their craft.

Many producers such as Pete Rock, Large Professor and DJ Premier have found ways around paying artists fees for sampling their songs by using a production technique that all but makes those samples unrecognizable. These production geniuses will take an instrumental break from an old rock, soul or funk record and chop it up so precisely that it's almost impossible for anyone to know where they got the sample.

Other producers don't make any attempts to hide the obviousness of their samples and basically just loop an instrumental break in its original form to make their beats. Puff Daddy is the most notorious beat-jacker as he has taken samples from David Bowie and the Police and did nothing else but loop these beats to make his "own" music.

Whether a sample seems really obvious or the producer makes great attempts to hide their sources, the point is that these men are paying tribute to those artists that they sample. For example, when producer Buckwild samples the break from David Axelrod's "Holy Thursday," he is basically expressing that he is inspired by Axelrod's music and wants to reconfigure his work to form something that he can use as his own form of self-expression. The same thing rings true when producers sample James Brown, Issac Hayes, The Doors or any artist who provided inspiration to them.

The point is that hip-hop music was founded on the DJ looping a popular instrumental break to create a beat that was easy to listen to and more importantly, fun to dance to. When hip-hop producers are charged enormous fees by some artists it's almost like a slap in the face because all they are trying to do is show respect to that particular artist. It's extremely difficult to advance an art form that is continuing to be held back by what it was initially founded upon.

Original musical this weekend

By Arkadiy Finn
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Sam Krentzman shook awake at 3 a.m., grabbed the pen and paper next to his bed and proceeded to write. When he woke up the next morning, he found the outline to his musical Fool's Rust waiting for him on his bedside table. Presented this weekend by the UMass sketch comedy troupe Active Ingredients, this original musical boasts a story filled with passion, revenge and hope.

Fool's Rust is set in the Irish part of Boston in 1926. The story follows two brothers, Jim and Simon, played by Nate Plummer and Steven Hemingway. Having been orphaned in childhood, the brothers were raised by close friends of their parents, Thom and Brenna O'Malley. They are a childless couple that runs a pub that serves as the social gathering place in the play. Events unfold as the neighborhood becomes entrenched in a gang war between Simon and a rival gang leader.

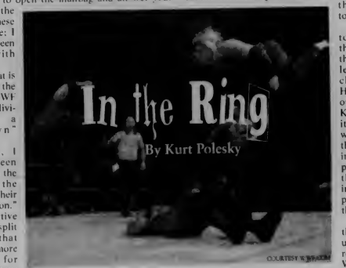
Written and scored entirely by Sam Krentzman, it was first produced at the Center for the Arts in Natick last summer. Krentzman is a firm believer in the innate beauty of performing arts.

"The show, the music, the songs are meant to evoke emotion and excitement and bring out the simple pleasure of live theater," said Krentzman.

Fool's Rust is performed with a live band featuring percussion, violin, saxophone, guitar and a piano giving it an almost rock opera feel. Krentzman doubles as the musical director, playing piano and bass during the show.

The cast consists of a mixture of Theatre Guild members, Theater Department members and others who responded to audition flyers posted around campus. Such a varied group of actors promises to deliver a distinctive experience to UMass theatergoers and newcomers alike. The production faced many challenges, such as being severely understaffed and under-funded. However, the actors and the technical crew managed to overcome the difficulties.

"The show is just as much for the actors as it is for the audience," said Krentzman.



Combining the power of song with the vibrant presence of a live band, this original musical adds new dimensions to the familiar themes of love, anger and desire. Although the show is set in the earlier part of this century, Fool's Rust transcends its setting and carries across the generation gap to the modern audience.

"[The characters] face extreme circumstances and situations," said director Melissa Fendell. "They are true, honest characters and the audience members should be able to see at least one aspect of themselves in them."

Fool's Rust opened last night in room 65, Bartlett Hall and will run through this weekend; with performances tonight and Sat. at 8 p.m. Admission is free to all.

Answers to unasked questions

Since the debut of "In The Ring," I have been inundated with letter after letter from readers with questions and comments on the wacky world of wrestling. This week, it's time to open the mailbag and answer your questions. (By the way, most of these letters are fake; I haven't really been inundated with mail.)

Q: Kurt, what is your opinion of the "split" of the WWF into a "Raw" division and a "Smackdown" division?

A: So far, I have been impressed with the "split," or as the WWF puts it, their "brand extension." The most positive aspect of the split is definitely that there will be more TV time for wrestlers who have been lost in the shuffle in recent months. People like RVD, Booker and even Chris Jericho will benefit without the usual suspects participating in every main event. At the very least, the concept will help to keep stories and characters fresh since they won't be exposed four hours per week (not even counting the weekend shows) as they had been.

Q: I heard Kevin Nash is injured. Say it ain't so!

A: Kevin Nash is indeed injured. He has suffered a torn bicep and is expected to miss several months of ring action. Exactly how the limited physical activity that Nash engages in could result in injury is still a mystery, which leads to the obvious joke that the muscle was pulled when lifting a beer.

Q: In your humble opinion, who is the best all around (in the ring and on the microphone) wrestler in the United States today?

A: That's a tough question, as there are several in the WWF who could legitimately lay claim to that title. However, one stands out above the rest: Kurt Angle. It's true; it's true. After only three years, Angle's in ring skills are on par with the best in the world, and his interview skills and personality may be the very best.

Q: I heard that Steve Austin is upset with the current direction of the WWF? Is this true?

A: It is true that Austin has been upset with the WWF since the arrival of the NWO. Austin wasn't pleased at being asked to play second fiddle to The Rock, Triple H and Hogan at Wrestlemania. Since then, he has taken a week off in protest, and upon returning, the WWF appeased him with a storyline where Flair and McMahon both desperately wanted him for "their show." The WWF should be careful not to upset Austin since the WWF may only have access to The Rock for a few special matches per year should The Rock elect to pursue an acting career full time. Possibly, losing The Rock as a full time wrestler makes Austin all the more valuable for the WWF.

Q: Is it true that the WWF is going to seriously push a cruiserweight division?

A: I doubt the WWF will ever seriously push a cruiserweight division, as Vince McMahon has always been a mark for the "big guys." However, there have been some rumors that Smackdown will host the cruiserweight division, and the WWF will attempt to beef the division up with the signing of Rey Mysterio Jr. There has always been a problem in getting a cruiserweight division over in the United States, since wrestlers don't want to be labeled as cruiserweights, as being labeled as such limits their possibilities for achieving main event status. Still, an exciting cruiserweight division can add some genuine entertainment to a wrestling promotion. The cruiserweight division was an underrated aspect of WCW's mid 1990's surge. As far as the WWF actually pushing it, they have the talent to do it, but I'll believe it when I see it.

Q: What's with these rumors that Jeff Jarrett is starting his own wrestling promotion?

A: Jeff Jarrett and his father have either landed or are very close to landing (depending on who you listen to) a deal to air weekly Pay Per Views on Wednesday Nights beginning in June. The shows will be two hours long and cost $9.95. Jarrett's father, Jerry, worked behind the scenes in the WWF during the late 80s and early 90s and in the WCW front office in the mid 1990s. As of right now, there is no word on which wrestler the promotion expects use for talent, since most of the existing talent in the United States is tied up with WWF contracts. One notable part of the concept is that the promotion will have no television programming of its own outside of the weekly Pay Per View, meaning the Pay Per Views will essentially be a combination of a weekly television show and a Pay Per View special. Will people be willing to spend $10 per week on this? I doubt it.

Disco Biscuit fever

By Kelly Wilson
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

It's time to dig out your favorite dancing shoes, because the Disco Biscuits are coming to town! After a smoking New Years run that ended with a bang in their hometown of Philadelphia, the band took a short break and headed back to the studio to record their fourth album. Disco fever has begun to sweep the nation yet again. The Disco Biscuits kicked off their spring tour on March 6 with a California run, and they are jamming their way across the country to land at our very own Pearl Street on Monday, April 8.

If you have never had the opportunity to attend a Biscuits show, it is a truly captivating experience. The music is something the band has self-titled "trancefusion." It's a unique combination of thumping trance beats, rambling guitar riffs, haunting vocals and fierce synthesizer effects from the true leader of the band, keyboard player Aron Magner. The other band members include Sam Altman on percussion, Marc Brownstein on bass, and the very chic Jon "the Barber" Gutwillig on lead guitar. They combine forces to create a frenetic, progressive journey that twists and transforms. When they incorporate their own wandering techno versions of classical pieces like "Dance of the Sugar Plum Fairies," the sound starts to resemble a circus on acid.

These four guys seem to be settling comfortably into a new groove, with their sound getting tighter and more polished with every show they play, not to mention the new lighting engineer, who has taken the whole experience to an even higher level. They have been touring nearly nonstop since their regrouping after Brownstein took a brief hiatus. But now, the clubs they play burn hotter with every beat, and they don't stop peaking until sweat pours from the ceilings. In fact, at a Baltimore show during the last tour, it got so hot that the fire alarms went off, cutting off the power and putting a delay in the music. The Disco Biscuits actually seemed to enjoy this idea, so they invited a group of fire dancers to join them in Chicago last weekend. The spring tour will finish in New Orleans with an all night party at the legendary Jazz Festival on May 3.

At all of the upcoming shows, a team of DJs will join the Biscuits, spinning house and trance music to ensure that the set breaks are smooth and rejuvenating. This is a great addition for a band that notoriously shows up late and takes extra long breaks. But perhaps the best thing about this phenomenon otherwise known as the Disco Biscuits is that they have yet to achieve the underrated stardom that eventually consumes megabands like Phish. This means that tickets are still $20, even though they do sell out many shows. And the venues are still small, intimate clubs where you can sit at the bar and order drinks. That's right, you don't have to pay $12 for a warm plastic cup of whatever generic beer happens to be sponsoring the event. And if you really enjoy the show, you can always head north for the next night, at Higher Ground in nearby Vermont. That is, after all, why they call it a tour.

First annual undergrad essay prizes announced

The Massachusetts Center for Renaissance Studies, located in Amherst, has recently announced two new writing prizes open to all five-college undergraduate students. The Francis Bacon Prize will go to the best scholarly or critical paper no longer than 20 pages on any subject or text on the Renaissance, from 1400 to 1700. The Petrarch Prize is awarded to the best creative work that draws upon ideas, texts or forms of writing during the Renaissance.

The Francis Bacon prize is named for the essayist and scientist who invented the scientific method. Submitted pieces may be from work that originated in the writer's class, but this is not a requirement. The Petrarch prize can include works of poetry, fiction or memoir. It is named for the 14th century Italian poet and humanist, who was the first major lyric poet of the Renaissance.

The center's staff, upon wanting to honor undergraduates, developed the contests, said Arthur Kinney, the director of the Center.

Judges will include Renaissance faculty from the five colleges. Winners will be awarded book prizes and certificates at a public ceremony to take place at the center on Friday, May 3.

The deadline for this first annual contest is April 23. Writers should submit blind copies of their work with a cover sheet that includes name, address, and phone number to: Renaissance Center, PO Box 2300, Amherst, 01004.

For more information, call the Renaissance Center at 577-3600.

Softball extends win streak to eight

Sortino's crew perfect at home in 33 games

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Someone better call the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and soon, because after the Black Bears were thrashed on Thursday afternoon, the agency might have to put them on the endangered species list.

The Massachusetts softball team swept a doubleheader against non-conference opponent Maine at the Softball Complex yesterday, running its record to 23-10 on the year. The two wins also kept alive the team's home winning streak, now at 33 consecutive games, as well as the Maroon and White's eight-game winning streak overall. On a cold Amherst afternoon, the Minutewomen fought through the elements to come away with two solid victories.

UMass	3	6
Maine	1	2

"It was not a great day to be playing softball," Head Coach Elaine Sortino said. "It was a very tough day to play the game, but I thought we did well considering the circumstances."

The Maroon and White opened the twin bill by knocking off Maine 3-1 in a well-pitched, tightly contested game. UMass got on the board immediately in the first, as senior captain Teri Rooney scored off of a Scooter Wheeler RBI single to give the Minutewomen a 1-0 lead. Jamie Cahalan opened the second inning with an RBI double and was moved over on an Anna Perey single. Cahalan scored her team's second run of the game when she came home on Perey's stolen base attempt.

After Maine's Leigh Hlywak smacked a home run to left to cut the Black Bear deficit in half, UMass picked up an insurance run in the fifth, on an Emily Robustelli sacrifice fly.

Jen Hadley picked up the victory for the Minutewomen, as she pitched a three-hitter while striking out seven Black Bear batters.

"I thought Jen gave us a great effort on the mound," Sortino said. "It was really tough to pitch today."

In the second game, Maine jumped out to an early 2-0 lead off freshman hurler Kelli Arnold. With two ducks on the pond, the Black Bears' Nicole Taylor flared a single into right field under a sliding Anna Perey, scoring both runners. Maine would not have another serious offensive threat, however, as Arnold closed the door on the visitors. The Kalama, Wash. native allowed only two hits the rest of the game, while striking out seven total Black Bear hitters. What made her performance even more superb was that she was making her first appearance on the mound in nearly a month.

"I thought Kelli did a good job for someone who hasn't been on the mound for three and a half weeks," Sortino said.

"At first, I was kinda nervous since it was my first home game," Arnold said. "But I knew we could come back, because two runs isn't much."

After being kept off the scoreboard by Maine and its pitcher Taylor for the first three innings, the Minutewomen knotted up the game with a pair of runs in the fourth. Rooney opened the inning with a single, and Wheeler followed by taking advantage of a pair of Taylor errors on one play. After bobbling Wheeler's comebacker to the mound, she threw the ball away past first base allowing the runners to move up to second and third. Kaila Holtz followed with a bloop double into left field, plating Rooney. Maine threw out Wheeler at the plate on a nifty defensive play, as she tried to score on a fly ball to left by Cahalan. However, Nicole Wilson followed with an infield RBI single to drive in pinch-runner Aisha Franke and deadlock the two squads.

UMass broke the game open in the fifth, as five consecutive hitters reached base on four singles and an error on the Black Bear second baseman. Rooney, Wheeler, Franke and Cahalan all scored for the Maroon and White to put the game out of reach.

Arnold also received some solid defensive help in the field, as the Minutewomen played errorless ball behind her in game two. Perey led the charge with a highlight reel catch in the sixth inning, and she sprinted towards the line to snag a would-be extra base hit.

"I thought we did well to come from behind; we showed a lot of character," Sortino said.

The Minutewomen will travel to the City of Brotherly Love this weekend as they clash in a three game set with Atlantic 10 foe St. Joseph's. The Hawks enter this weekend with a record of 16-4, but are reeling after three consecutive losses to cross-town rival Temple. St. Joe's, however has been solid at the plate, boasting a .324 team average, with six team members hitting well over .300. Saturday's doubleheader starts at noon, while Sunday's lone game will similarly begin at 12 p.m.

Scooter Wheeler leads the team in homeruns with four and RBIs with 17.

Senior Teri Rooney went 3-for-6 at the plate and scored three runs in yesterday's doubleheader against Maine.

UMass streaks back home

Ready to make it eight straight

By Matthew F. Saco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's easy when you are the one doing the hunting, just ask the UMass lacrosse team. Last year nobody in the TCAC was really paying attention to the Minutemen and before they knew it, UMass tore through the conference with a 9-1 record and an average victory margin of over four and a half goals.

But this season, the TCAC was there coming. And the Minutemen have had to battle through two grueling road victories against Navy (15-10) and Penn State (15-12). This weekend another star on turf awaits, as Greg Cannella and his squad welcome Maryland-Baltimore County to Garber Field.

Cannella expects the same kind of game from the Retrievers as his team got from Ivy League foes PSU and Navy.

"They are not going to be intimidated," Cannella said. "They are going to come in here to play their very best. They'll play with a lot of heart and a lot of determination." And likely a lot of vengeance on their mind.

Last season the Minutemen went down to Baltimore and pasted the Retrievers 16-10. Don Little burried five goals as UMass trounced the Retrievers with payback from a home overtime loss a year earlier on their minds. But this season, UMBC will hold the card.

The Retrievers are for the second year in a row, a young team. But right now they could be playing their best lacrosse of the season.

"They are playing very, very well right now," Cannella said. "They beat Rutgers by four goals. They beat Penn State two weeks ago. They're feeling good about themselves right now."

Yes, well UMBC won't be the only team brooding confidence on Garber Field this Saturday afternoon. Since an opening weekend loss to Hofstra in OT, the Minutemen have reeled of seven straight wins, none more dramatic than last weekend's tilt at Penn State.

For most of the year, it has been the senior attack tandem of Dan Paccione and Marc Morley leading the way on offense. They are tied for the team lead with 28 points, and Paccione is tops on the squad with 22 goals.

But in last week's game, it was the midfielders that captured the glory. While Paul Hutchen and his defensive middy's were pounding on game hinging ground balls, Chris Fiore was putting five goals and Kevin Leveille was scoring the game-winner from just inside the restraining box with 30 seconds left to play in the game.

The same kind of output from the midfielders would be welcome in Saturday's contest.

Probably the biggest component to this weekend's matchup will be in the face-off circle.

Like UMass' duo of senior Paccione and rookie Craig Conn, the Retrievers also have a pair of draw men. Midfielder Pat Muston and long pole Greg Wojtech will man the circle for UMBC. Paccione won three key draws at the end of the game last week, while Conn was nearly unbeatable until he gave way to Paccione when crunch time arrived.

"We're still going to platoon," Cannella said. "But Craig did well last week. He's worked tremendously hard the last few weeks, even more so than he did earlier in the year."

If the Minutemen can again take care of business on face-offs, they will hold a big edge over the Retrievers in possessions and, in turn, chances for victory.

Senior Marc Morley is tied for the team lead in scoring with 28 points in 8 games.

Tennis continues to look for first victory

By Elena Panesis

In any athletic competition, a person must possess passion and drive to excel. With the recent elimination of the Massachusetts men's tennis team, the 0-16 squad has not played up to its potential due to a lack of heart and motivation, which cannot be harshly criticized considering the circumstances.

"It's hard because they know the team is gone," said Coach Judy Dixon. "We're better than our record states. We've lost our heart. We were already a struggling team, but now it's just that much more difficult."

Shortly after hearing the crippling news, the Maroon and White embarked on its annual spring break trip to Florida where it battled the top teams in the Eastern region. Despite four losses to stellar programs, Stetson, Jacksonville, Lynn and North Florida, some Minutemen did show flashes of brilliance under the warm, Floridian sun.

Junior Jed Greenberg stunned audiences, slamming Stetson's Ben Adrian 6-2, 7-5 and also emerged as the lone UMass singles' winner against No. 5 North Florida with a 6-1, 7-6 victory against Stephen Poulos. Freshman Scott Sans-Leeb captured the other singles win in the 5-2 defeat to Stetson with a some behind win versus Kenny Bohannon 4-6, 6-2, 6-4.

The Minutemen travel to Florida and battle tough competition in order to gain experience for the rest of the spring season in particular conference matches and the Atlantic 10 tournament. Though the squad did not overcome adversity and triumph in face-offs to A-10 conference schools Villanova and St. Joseph's, UMass showed some positive improvements in its play.

The doubles tandems of Eric Reblin/Sans-Leeb and Greenberg/Phil Cohen both came up big against St. Joseph's, taking the much-needed point for the Maroon and White. However, the momentum did not extend to singles play. Greenberg continued to impress though, breezing past Bob Cappelli 6-2, 6-4, as did Sans-Leeb, who surpassed Van Homer Pangilman at No. 3 7-5, 6-4.

Moreover, No. 4 Sans-Leeb showed off his skills in the Villanova match slamming Auron Kusza in two sets: 7-5, 6-4. No. 1 Steve Prisco secured the other singles win for UMass in the 5-2 loss de-clawing Wildcat Brad Adams 6-4, 6-1.

"I benched Steve for the St. Joseph's match due to behavior," said Dixon. "We could have won that, but without him, it was difficult. Villanova was a winnable match, but we lost three, three set matches. With a little more heart, we could have won."

The squad will journey to West Point, N.Y. this Saturday to battle top-notch Army in what should have been a doubleheader, but conference foe Temple was forced to pull out for financial reasons.

"The new athletic director for Temple told the team to hold off on trips," said Dixon. "They didn't take a spring break trip, and we really needed to play them for A-10's. We don't need to play Army, who is very good."

After the short road trip, the squad will return to the Upper Boyden courts for Senior Day on Sunday with a vital match against conference rival Fordham.

"Fordham is a match that we should win," said Dixon. "We'll be seeded in the last third of the A-10's, but if the kids can find it in their hearts, I think we will be the dark horse in the tournament. So my hope is to beat Fordham with a good showing from all the players since a lot of parents are coming. We need to go out with a bang rather than a fizzle."

University Childcare to remain open

TIM BRADBURY/COLLEGIAN

University Childcare was extended through the summer and next academic year. The extension will come at a the cost of parents through fee increases, and not the University.

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts will keep the University Child Care center open through the summer months and the next academic year, reversing its earlier decision to cut the full-time day care facility.

The University will then discuss the further existence of the center with the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), which funds the two flexible-care classrooms at UCC.

The University contributes $527,595 to fund the five full-day classrooms.

The announcement by interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams and vice chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos was made on April 5.

"We are pleased that the many earnest discussions and determined efforts to advance creative alternatives to the imminent closing of the regular UCC program have produced the necessary outcomes for the University, the parents and children served, and the larger community," Williams said in a released statement.

"It is clear that child care is an important service to our campus," Cevallos said in a released statement. "This temporary transitional plan will ensure minimal disruption for the children in the program. Simultaneously, over the next couple of months we will continue to explore options to make child care available to our community in the future."

The January decision to close the center's full-day classrooms sparked protests and rallies from parents, students and faculty.

A University statement outlined the future for UCC.

Fewer classrooms will be open and not all of the 22 employees who received lay off notices will be called back. There will also be an increase in parents' fees and a different program.

"In addition to the two flexible-schedule classrooms, the revised program will offer two preschool and one toddler full-day classrooms," a University statement said. "All children currently enrolled will likely be accommodated, with a few additional spaces becoming available."

The closing of UCC became a rallying point for faculty, staff and students.

The Faculty Senate's Status of Women Council submitted a report to the Senate regarding the decision to close UCC. The Council states that the decision is unfriendly to women.

"The message the administration is sending is that women's scholarship, leadership and work is not valued at UMass and is irrelevant to the mission of the University," the report stated. "Closing UCC is a waste of resources of the Commonwealth. Cutting UCC will waste the $675,000 that has been spent already to build and upgrade UCC classrooms in the last three years ...closing University Child Care is a foolish choice. UMass-Amherst is demonstrating to its faculty that it does not value their families or their work."

Civil liberties remain issue during war

By Peter Preston
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the wake of the terrorist events that shook the United States of America, there has been a shift in country sentiment towards civil liberties.

"Danger tips the balance between liberty and security," said Nancy Rosenblum, a professor of government at Harvard University.

Rosenblum led a discussion entitled "Constitutional Reason of State: The Fear Factor" at Amherst College this past Saturday. Also in attendance at the discussion were several other distinguished social scientists from some of the nation's best colleges and universities.

The event was entitled, "Loyalty and Dissent in Dangerous Times," and was sponsored by the president, dean of the faculty, lecture committee and department of law, jurisprudence and social thought at Amherst College.

The focus of Rosenblum's discussion was public fear about such events as the World Trade Center attacks and the possibility of further attacks.

Rosenblum led the discussion with a reading of a recently compiled paper on this public fear. She theorized that the government might be making an attempt to play off of the public's fear in order to create a renewed reliability on the government.

Rosenblum explained the possibility that members of the state are exploiting the fear.

"The authorities that are claiming to be protecting the people might also be aggravating that fear," she said.

A result of this aggravation would then be the new restraints being put on civil liberties – the recent Freedom of Information Act being an example of these new restrictions.

Civil liberties are often constrained in times of emergency, she explained. Several government agencies are given power to classify information that could be considered a threat or harm to security.

Rosenblum also claimed that the president, in times of emergency or crisis, conducts the country as though it were a prescribed constitutional dictatorship in which the leader is elected by the people and is given ultimate power to make decisions regarding both liberty and security.

Rosenblum speculated that the nation might be better off if the president were to have to receive clearance from an outside authority. A recent example of this conversion from president to constitutional dictator is the Gulf War, started by President George Bush without the consultation of the Congress.

"The president should practice prerogative or discretional power. Doing good without working with the law can sometimes lead to a great public good," said Rosenblum. She then referenced Machiavelli's The Prince, stating that it's a good idea to know how to do wrong by the public because it would also teach how to not to do wrong.

Rosenblum went on to explain that she is in disagreement with the policies that have been put in place by President Bush and the government in the attempt to quell the national fear that has been prevalent ever since 9/11. She does not agree with the restraints being put on civil liberties and the heightened sense of fear that she claims could be due largely to the government itself.

Citing the creation of the Department of Homeland Security and its several billion-dollar budget, Rosenblum said that she believes it to be largely a waste of money.

In response, David Cole, a professor of law at Georgetown University, asked Rosenblum, "What would you do?"

"I think that the government is acting out of a genuine belief that they are doing what they can to help the people," said Cole.

Fire safety remains hot topic across campus

By Melissa Hammel
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"How will you get out?"

This is the question "Living with Fire: A Student Fire Safety Program" is asking students across college campuses as a way to promote fire safety among college campuses. The group has been spreading messages a number of ways including slogans like, "Smoke Detectors. Got Batteries?" and "Cook your Dinner. Not the Kitchen" on frisbees across campus.

The weeklong series of fire safety events is being held by the Five-College community in conjunction with area fire departments.

SCOTT LEHRER/COLLEGIAN

The Delta Upsilon Fraternity recently experienced the destruction of fire, losing their fraternity house to fire earlier this year.

The series, which runs today through Friday, will kick off with a live burning of mock dormitory rooms at both the University of Massachusetts on Tuesday April 9 and at Smith College on April 10. The mock burning is designed to show students the speed in which a dormitory can burn down and how effective sprinklers can be in controlling fires.

Throughout the week there will also be members of the Amherst Fire Department Student Engine Company, all of whom are students at UMass, on hand to staff fire safety booths at all of the colleges.

Other highlights of the week's events include teaching students to properly use fire extinguisher, allowing them to crawl through a smoke-filled trailer and take a ride in the platform of an aerial truck.

The week's events also include raffle prizes for those who participate in the fire extinguisher training or complete a fire safety crossword puzzle. Prizes include a mountain bike donated by Valley Bicycles of Amherst, a kayak from Adventure Outfitters in Hadley, ticket discounts on Southwest Airlines, a complimentary dinner courtesy of the Hampshire Hospitality Group and a gift certificate from Big Y Supermarkets.

In addition, fire safety frisbees will be given away as well as approximately 20,000 fire safety stickers which will be distributed at area pizza places near campus.

"Living with Fire" is a program that will be going on at a number of campuses across the country. A group called Campus Firewatch, a magazine that deals with fire safety issues across college campuses, designed the program. The purpose of the organization is to serve as a resource for fire safety personnel.

"Living With Fire is a program designed to provide effective, targeted material for the campus fire safety professional to use in delivering fire safety training and education to students, both on and off-campus," the mission statement explains.

The magazine and number of campus events were created in an effort to decrease the amount of fires that take place in both dormitories and in fraternity and sorority houses across the United States.

"Campus fire safety is a serious concern," the organization's website explains. "Over 1,700 fires a year occur in dormitories and Greek housing, causing $2.8 million in damage per year. Tragic fires at Seton Hall, Chapel Hill, Bloomsburg, Millikin and other universities have brought a new level of

INTERNATIONAL BRIEFS

Ecuador

By Robin Weber
COLLEGIAN DAILY STAFF WRITER (U. OREGON)

(U-WIRE) EUGENE, Ore. — After being arrested with 10 environmental activists in Ecuador last week, University of Oregon graduate student Daniel Randolph returned to Eugene, Ore., with more than just facts for his master's thesis. He came back inspired by what he saw.

"I learned through firsthand experience how fighting fear and how governments can do what they want," he said. "I was inspired by the people I saw there fighting."

Randolph was interviewing peaceful activists who have been protesting since Jan. 2 the construction of an oil pipeline in the Mindo Nambillo Protected Cloudforest. He said the research is part of his master's thesis on exporting oil from the jungle.

Although he said he knew of the physical dangers and the political conflicts in the area, the risk of imprisonment did not cross his mind because he thought most of the construction of the pipeline would occur in April and March.

Randolph arrived in Ecuador March 21 intending to stay through all of spring break. Little did he know he would spend three days of his trip in prison and be deported a week later.

He spent only one day at the Cloudforest site and was arrested the next day, last Thursday, while walking down a hill. He was told he was violating his visa for tourism by engaging in a political protest but was given no further explanation.

Randolph, however, said he only was working on his thesis.

"I was interested in our dependence on oil leading us on a dangerous path and there being little economic advancement for Ecuadorian people," he said.

He then was sent to a hearing, where no English translators were allowed for assistance.

After being deported, Randolph also was told he could not return to Ecuador for five years. He is appealing the ruling.

His experience was brightened by the number of visitors he had during his detainment, he said.

"I had visitors from (Oleoducto de Crudos Pesados) and individuals," he said. "I had lots of support."

Randolph is keeping the topic for his thesis, which now includes a documentary of his experience in Ecuador.

India

By Maura Halpern
INDIANA DAILY STUDENT (INDIANA U.)

(U-WIRE) BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — Even halfway around the world they wanted to make a difference. They believed distance was not a big enough barrier to keep them from improving the lives of those who are less fortunate and suffering the harsh effects of poverty.

Indiana University's recently developed local chapter of Association for India's Development (AID) is a nonprofit charitable organization that works to support a number of social development projects and human rights and to improve living conditions of underprivileged citizens in India.

Since its recent advent in February, the local AID chapter is among 25 others in the nation, with a fast-growing number of members and volunteers.

Graduate student Lavanya Ramakrishnan, a member and volunteer of the local chapter said she is inspired by her culture and believes it is important to realize how others around the world, unfortunately, do not receive the same opportunities as do many in the United States.

"Not everyone in the world is lucky enough to get a good education and a chance to utilize some of the facilities available at IU," Ramakrishnan said. "I come from a country that has a very rich cultural heritage, yet there are a lot of children who have never been to school and women who have never received an education."

A few of the current projects with which AID is involved include rebuilding schools in rural areas of India, training women in sewing and other valuable skills that will assist them in providing a living for themselves. They also work to increase literacy.

To help this cause, IU's local AID chapter will be hosting a number of fund-raising events this semester, including one at 3 p.m. Saturday in room 223 of the Kelley School of Business.

There will be a Hindi movie showing, and all donations will go directly to the AID cause. The time of the event has not been announced yet.

The group meets every Sunday from 5:30 to 6:30 p.m. for a community service hour, where students organize plans and work to disseminate information to others on campus about the organization.

The national AID organization began in 1991, when a group of students at University of Maryland decided they wanted to go a step further and do something about the impoverished living conditions in India, and since then, the program has grown to an organization of about 300 people. In addition to the numerous chapters in the United States, there are also AID chapters in India, Australia, Germany and the United Kingdom, according to the national Web site.

Graduate student Rajesh Viswanathan, president of IU's AID chapter, said he was inspired by his friends in North Carolina and decided he wanted to transform his positive intentions into action by contributing to the development in India.

AID was started with the motive of bridging the gap of inequality of opportunities that exists today in India, especially in the rural villages," Viswanathan said. "The intention here is not just to make every rural village into a big city but to improve education and health facilities, thus building a stronger society."

Members say this program not only ultimately benefits people overseas in India but also seeks to inform IU students about the importance of culture and diversity. All students are encouraged to help the cause.

"We hope students will get involved in the activities of our organization so that they get to know about our country and the issues surrounding its future development and also because awareness of social issues is an integral part of our campaign," graduate student Sowmya Ravikumar said. "We don't just appeal to people of Indian origin. To contribute, we want to broaden our supporter base to all good samaritans. The fact that we are helping out these causes in India is just an artifact of where we come from."

Israel

COLORADO DAILY (U. COLORADO)

(U-WIRE) BOULDER, Colo. — While students at University of Colorado have been discouraged from studying abroad in Israel for the past two years, other large universities throughout the nation are just now suspending their Study in Israel programs, following the escalating violence between Israelis and Palestinians.

In recent weeks the University of California, University of Washington, Indiana University and Pennsylvania State University have suspended their programs.

UC's decision, made Tuesday, was prompted by an escalated warning from the U.S. State Department. Students have been told they can stay in Israel, but only at their own risk.

John Marcum, director of UC's Education Abroad Program, had decided earlier in March not to suspend the program with the hope that "U.S. intercession will result in a ceasefire and resumption of the peace process between Israelis and Palestinians."

Drug supplements could equal danger for consumers

About 59 percent of the U.S. population consumes some sort of dietary supplement. This has led to a multi-billion dollar empire in the supplement industry. The major drawback to this is that the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), which ensures a safe food supply, has been overwhelmed with ensuring the safety and efficacy of the millions of dietary supplements available to consumers.

Two drugs have been under scrutiny recently because of problems associated with their use: Kava Kava and a weight-loss drug known as LipoKinetix.

Kava Kava (Piper methysticum) is a natural herb that has been claimed to promote a feeling of euphoria and relaxation, as well as preventing sleeplessness, reducing anxiety and many more.

Kava is often consumed as tea, but the plant can also be incorporated into whole foods. The FDA Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition has released a statement that Kava may be damaging to the liver.

Several cases of liver-related injury have been noted, including cirrhosis, hepatitis and liver failure. The recommendation is now to avoid Kava itself, or products containing the herb. If you consume or have consumed Kava, stop so immediately until more research can be done.

LipoKinetix is a supplement that has been claimed to "mimic exercise." It contains norephedrine, caffeine, yohimbine, 3,5, diiodothyronine (mimics the thyroid gland) and sodium usniate. Several cases of liver damage have been noted, as well as one individual requiring a liver transplant. Sodium usniate is the likely culprit for the problems associated with the supplement. If you are consuming any supplements containing any of those found in LipoKinetix, stop so immediately.

These are just two examples of problems that can occur in supplements. Supplements are not regulated by the FDA. "Dietary supplements" should contain a statement on the side of the bottle that reads, "This statement has not been evaluated by the Food and Drug Administration. This product is not intended to diagnose, treat, cure or prevent any disease."

In 1994, Congress passed the Dietary Supplements Health and Education Act. This law allows for structure/function claims that suggest nutritional support for supplements. This type of assertion allows food supplement sellers to make claims supported by less evidence than the FDA requires for traditional health claims. An example of a structure/function claim is for an anti-cancer supplement that says, "supports immune function" on the label. The claim doesn't explicitly say, "prevents cancer," but it is quite apparent what the supplement is touted to do. Unlike health claims, nutritional support statements do not need to be approved by the FDA before manufacturers market products bearing the statements. The only requirement is that the FDA is notified no later than 30 days after a product that bears the claim is first marketed. Basically, the FDA must now prove that the claims are valid by researching the supplement themselves. This is a rather lengthy process, and considering the number of supplements available, an almost impossible one. This has allowed the supplement industry to make a substantial profit and expand the kinds and amounts of supplements it releases to the public.

Consumers are often unaware of some of the dangers associated with using unregulated dietary supplements. Rarely do problems related to certain supplements make national headlines. Even when dangerous supplements are supposed to be withdrawn from the market, oftentimes they remain on store shelves.

What you see is not always what you get. Research conducted on products that claim they contain a certain ingredient has shown that rarely is that ingredient in that product. Saw palmetto and gingko biloba are two examples. After looking at a variety of different products, almost none of these compounds were found in the product. Some reasons for this are that they are expensive to extract or purchase, or that they just don't "survive" the packaging process.

As consumers are bombarded with unsubstantiated claims, purchasing dietary supplements will remain a "buyer beware" market. Watch out for claims that suggest something is "revolutionary," "breakthrough," "ancient secret," etc… Manufacturers will say whatever they have to in order for you to buy their product.

Not knowing what you are buying may be damaging to your body and your wallet. Read more about what you intend to buy before you actually spend your money on a supplement. Professional literature is your best bet, not something from a health magazine. Be Healthy!

In response, Rosenblum did not wholly disagree.

She added that if the government were acting with this genuine belief, then she would have to wonder to what degree.

Another colleague at the discussion spoke of the balance between liberty and security.

"National security restrains freedoms," he said. "Too much freedom would create a totally self-preserving society."

The event was considered a success by event organizer, Austin Sarat, the William Nelson Cromwell Professor of Law, Jurisprudence and Social Thought at the school.

The discussion was one of six held at Amherst College over the course of Friday and Saturday.

Cheaters never win

Well, they shouldn't

A recent study conducted by the Rutgers University Management Education Center concluded that of the 4,500 high school students surveyed, roughly 75 percent of them participate in serious cheating.

And what's worse is that over half of those students don't think that there is anything wrong with cheating. Now, we all know that at first glance it looks like the students are the one's to blame here and in many facets they are. But isn't there a case to be made for the amount of pressure being placed on 16 and 17 year-olds.

First ask George Mason High School (Va.) student Alice Newhall. Newhall admits that the workload that most students are presented with – including those seven classes a day, homework and successful expectations – is too much for a student to bear. Newhall argues that without cheating many students find themselves in the middle of the pack academically and are therefore unable to compete for a spot at the nation's top universities.

She also argues that entering a top level college leads to a better life, so the risk of not cheating is too great. In many ways she is right.

It is a fact that grades are by far the most emphasized facet of a student's resume when applying to college. Admissions departments around the country use SAT scores and grade point averages as the be all, end all of the college acceptance game. There is little emphasis placed on the all around person, so the best way to make an impression is through simple statistics.

That fact alone can lead to cheating. With college applications being registered at an all-time high, the competitiveness of the academic realm has never been so high, and with it comes the pressures placed on high school students.

The Rutgers study also revealed that over half of the students surveyed plagiarize from the Internet. With this and the other statistics in mind, it is clear that something needs to be done. Many high schools have begun using an Internet service/engine where teachers can send in student papers, and within a couple days, the papers are sent back color coded for plagiarism.

It is clear that with the advances in technology it is now easier to go after the students that cheat on papers, but cheating on tests is virtually indefensible, save for clever teachers who can catch students in the act.

The change that needs to take place is not necessarily in defense of cheating, but in defense of the pressures that cause cheating. A perfect solution is nearly impossible, because the competition for admittance to universities will always be high. But if we can cut off some branches, cheating might become less of a threat.

Why has it never occurred to someone that lightening a student's load would help the cause? The less work there is, the less reason there is to cut corners. The biggest step toward lessening cheating, however, would be to somehow reduce the amount of pressure placed on grades.

It does seem like a utopian idea, but if we can somehow take some of the burden off of grades and scores and put it on the idea of the all-around person, it would do a world of good.

Israel-Palestine need ceasefire

Let me begin by letting out a large sigh. I am not happy to write this editorial. I am simply exorcising the demons of my nature. I am actually sorry about inflicting yet another Middle East opinion on the gentle reader. I have to get this off my chest, because I have been thinking about it for a couple of weeks. I know, as I write this, that my opinion is not definitive or widely held. I am speaking, of course, of the current situation in the Holy Land.

Well, I must begin by stating my allegiance to none of the parties involved in the current debate. I am neither Israeli nor Palestinian. I have never been to Jerusalem. I am an American, and my opinion is based on what I have gleaned from the almost constant news coverage of the events currently unfolding in the area in dispute. In short, I am telling the gentle reader to take my opinion with the usual grain of salt. I am no better suited to judge the actions of either side than the average American. The only reason I am writing this is that I cannot sleep at night because I constantly think about the current violence in Israel.

The Israeli Defense Force is wrong to kill innocent civilians. By the same token, Palestinian militants are wrong to kill Israeli civilians. Civilians are not supposed to be targets in any sort of warfare. Hamas and other terrorist organizations are evil and demonic in their preoccupation with civilian targets: malls, cafes, temples. I will never understand the rationale behind terrorism. Before I get too far, I should probably clarify what I consider terrorism. Terrorism, by my definition, is the use of violence against noncombatants for a political means. By any rule, if there can be such a thing, of war, civilians are not viable targets. It is different if the civilians are participating in a legal war effort (working in munitions factories, for example), but for the most part, children and other innocents should never be deliberately targeted for military action.

The recent Passover attacks are especially heinous, since they show absolute disregard for the enemy's civilian beliefs. Civilians – those not employed by war industries – should be allowed to continue their lives unencumbered. They should not be risking their lives while going to pray. Prayer is perhaps the last pure thing people can do, and to disrupt that with a terrorist bomb is a horrible act. However, I believe that the retaliation by the Israeli government has taken a few steps too far.

I understand that Israeli citizens have been attacked. As a victim of 9/11 (as all Americans were) I can sympathize. I do empathize with the families of the victims of the Passover attacks, and the victims of all the attacks by terrorists on Jewish citizens of Israel. I also sympathize with those Palestinian civilians killed or wounded in the recent offensive.

The Israeli military is wrong to launch rockets at neighborhoods, where innocents may live. In their justifiable lust for justice, Israeli military officers must not sacrifice innocent lives in their attempts to kill or capture terrorists. While I am glad that the ringleader behind the Passover violence has been dealt with, I am deeply saddened that a 14-year-old girl has been killed. The Israeli government should announce their sorrow over this, and other innocent deaths in this offensive. In fact, I believe the Israeli military should stand down and withdraw from the heaviest areas of fighting until some sort of agreement can be drawn up. There cannot be constant bloodshed. The Israelis must realize that they cannot kill every Palestinian, and the Palestinians must realize the futility of attacking one of the best-trained armies in the world. The wrongs of the past cannot be righted unless there is peace, and that will not happen unless this current wave of violence subsides.

> "No country or people benefit from the unspeakable violence currently being carried out by both sides."

In writing this, I realize my position: I recognize that I am not a diplomat, or analyst or any other figure of power. I understand the lowliness of my position, as a college newspaper columnist. However, I am hoping whoever reads this will realize that the eyes of the world are on the West Bank right now, and that whatever happens will be almost instantaneously broadcast to all corners of the globe. Israel is not a superpower. It has little global weight to throw around in the United Nations. It must rely on its allies for advice on what to do. Unfortunately, it is not doing that. This course of action can only result in more tragedy and blood. This is the sort of situation where any sane, rational person, realizing that there are no clear or easy answers, would wish to call a "time out." Withdrawing Israeli military might from the disputed area might do well to serve this perception. Palestinian nationalist terrorists should also take this as a cue to calm down a bit.

The entire area would do well with a break from the fighting. To me, it does not matter what or who the United States must send to serve this purpose. It is in no one's interest for the current trend to continue. No country or people benefit from the unspeakable violence currently being carried out by both sides. Too many lives have been lost in this fight so far. Actually re-fighting a war with something other than simulated casualties is nothing short of irresponsible, reckless and wasteful. Real blood is being spilled, Real tears are falling. This is not playacting, by either side, or any stretch of the word.

No one party is to blame here. I do not pretend to know every intricate detail of the conflict, but I do understand that civilians and other noncombatants are being killed, and that strikes me as very wrong. It is one thing to have a willing army: it is another to target average and ordinary citizens as they go about their daily lives.

However, my piece of the bargain was left to approximately $23,000 (multiplied by the four years one spends earning their degree). In the end, the fact that a measly 15-20 grand was all I'd owe after five whole years at good 'ole State U. I decided my new home was going to be in zip code 01003.

It's been four years since I had to make that big decision, and like anything else, I keep questioning myself. I haven't been up to the SMC campus since I visited, so that possibility usually stays out of mind. This past month I had a chance to return to St. Joe's for the first time and contemplated life the past four years in the land of cheese steaks living up on Hawk Hill. And though I've yet to make an excursion back to the great plains of northern Indiana, I question my decision to not become a member of the Fightin' Irish all the time. In fact, lately it has been on a daily basis.

REGAN MCKENDRY

Now unlike many of my Minutemen brethren, I have had the experience of a private education. Before June 1998, my place of learning for seven years was the Austin Preparatory School, a small Catholic high school approximately 15 miles north of Boston. Now I will admit that the school was expensive by most standards: $5,000 for the 1991-1992 school year has grown to $8,900 for the 2001-2002 academic term. For that money, I was treated to the excellent education that some public school students get. Though mine also included class size averages of less than 20 (my personal low was 4 students in my junior year Latin IV class), as well as a sense of community I've never had at any school before or since.

When I was at Austin, I was part of an extended family. And like your own family, whenever I make that trek up the driveway of 101 Willow St., I forever feel like I'm coming home. The school changes and continues to grow and improve physically, academically, and technologically, all without increasing its student population. My friends are no longer at the school and soon I won't know a single member of the student body. When I go back for a Thanksgiving football game, though, in my 40s, I'll still belong because I'm a part of my life.

> "I love Massachusetts. But sorry UMass, you didn't give me any of that."

UMass is not a family. It is not a community in the true sense of the word. Oh sure, there are over 30,000 people here who make their lives as students, educators, and support staff, but they do not represent the same type of family that can be found at many private institutions. There is no such thing as UMass pride: it's a myth. When I'm at the Mullins Center rooting on the Minutemen, I'm rooting on my team, the same way I went nuts when the Patriots won the Super Bowl and will erupt when the Red Sox win the World Series (if I'm still alive).

What I'm not doing is boasting about the fact that I go to the State University for the Commonwealth. I have a ton of pride and loyalty to the Bay State, but UMass didn't instill any of that. That came from growing up here and appreciating all the greatness that surrounds this area. This is the same state that the Kennedy's came from; this is the home of Boston, the true jewel of a city in the northeast corner of America. This is where America started from Plymouth Rock in 1620 to the beginning of the revolution. I love Massachusetts. But sorry UMass, you didn't give me any of that.

What UMass has given me is a good education. I'll be prepared to enter the working world and will be well trained, whether I enter the world of transportation engineering or broadcasting or whatever career my life path leads to. And UMass did this at a great financial deal compared to all those other private schools.

However, UMass did not give me the social and community environment that I was used to from high school. It can't. There is no tradition at UMass. This is just another place to receive a college education. I'll use Notre Dame as a counterexample, as part of me still longs for South Bend. There is an atmosphere at Notre Dame that radiates throughout the whole environment (and it's not an air of protests). The school is full of tradition. Students there realize they are going to Notre Dame, and the unbelievable sense of accomplishment, responsibility and pride that fills them is indescribable. I felt it simply as a visitor to the campus four years ago.

Is UMass a good school? Yes. There is no doubt in my mind. However, is the school handicapped because it is a public institution? Absolutely. This country pioneered public education so as to educate the masses. For that, the system works, and will continue to in the future. However, private schools can offer so many more intangibles that a public school could only dream of. I appreciate my education here in Amherst, and know that the next year will probably be another one to remember. But don't try to tell me that private schools don't offer something better. They do; it's that simple. For as much as I love my friends and experiences at UMass, if I had a slightly deeper wallet, my address would be the heartland right now.

Incubus: mama's boys of rock

By Natassia Lopez
THE STANFORD DAILY (STANFORD U.)

(U-WIRE) STANFORD, Calif. – Tattoos, surfing, six packs, hip-hop, love ballads and rock 'n' roll. Could you really ask for anything more from a band? Incubus, one of the hottest bands in the world today, is kicking off its 50-date U.S. tour on April 11.

When people think "rock star," they typically think "cocaine, STDs and late-night parties with naked midgets covered in shaving cream."

Incubus, however, is no Led Zeppelin or Motley Crue. In fact, they are almost universally known as the "nice guys of rock." With multi-platinum record sales, the band, which was formed while its members were in high school in Calabasas, Calif., are some of the humblest and most hard-working guys in the industry. I spoke with Incubus' 29-year-old DJ, Chris Kilmore, about the band's latest album and tour.

Intermission: OK, you guys made an awesome first album. In the band's bio, Brandon [Boyd, lead singer] explains that you wanted the following album Morning View to be more adventurous and to, "transcend the confinement of the studio." So you guys got out of the studio and into a mansion in Malibu. How did that locality make it a much cooler creative experience?

Chris Kilmore: The environment really affects your creative process. Being in Malibu gave us more space and freedom. In the studio, it is much more dark and you have a lot of time constraints. Being on our own, we had 24 hours – any time of day to work. It was relaxing and bright. For a band, you have to make your first album in the studio so that you know your space. Then, once you get your work ethic down, you can decide what kind of environment you need to make a more "open" record.

Intermission: Do you consider this to be the best album you have made?

Kilmore: Yes. No question.

Intermission: What is your favorite song on Morning View?

Kilmore: You know, everyone asks me that, and it's so hard to answer because it changes day to day. Right now I really like "Warning."

Intermission: "Warning" is your new single at this time.

Kilmore: Yeah, that's probably why I like it so much. ... I've been hearing it constantly.

Intermission: How do you think rock stars are portrayed today? Do you guys consider yourself a typical rock band? What makes you different?

Kilmore: When I think of rock stars, I think of someone like Creed. The leather pants, the pyrotechnics. ... We just got back from touring with Creed in Australia. They are definitely rock stars. Scott [Stapp, Creed's lead singer] is wearing those leather pants, and they have fire shooting up everywhere during their shows. I do consider [Incubus] to be a typical band, with a twist. We're not afraid to be creative. We're very experimental.

Intermission: What kind of instruments did you guys experiment with on the new album?

Kilmore: We used a lot of strings. ... We also integrated Indian instruments, and flutes – made it very international. [Guitarist] Mike [Einziger] used some Chinese instruments. On the song "Aqueous Transmission," we tried out a pipa. It was all one step at a time. Everytime we experimented we were all like, "Wow. Interesting."

Intermission: I read in a recent interview in Rolling Stone that you guys really aren't the passive-aggressive band that everyone thinks you are. You guys like the parties, the porn, the women, except supposedly, for Brandon. How much do you hate being called the "nice guys of rock?"

Kilmore: I don't mind being called the "nice guys" at all. I'd rather be called that than anything else, because the truth is we really are nice guys. We all like to have a good time too, though. After the shows, we have people backstage, get really drunk, take shots, hang out. Most of us have girlfriends, but we all like the occasional strip club.

Intermission: A couple months ago, you finished your European tour. Which country was your favorite?

Kilmore: We've toured Europe six or seven times. This was the first time we did Japan and Australia. Portugal used to be my favorite country, but now I think Australia is getting up there.

Intermission: How receptive were the fans compared to American fans?

Kilmore: The fans are pretty much the same. Each time, we play bigger and bigger places. One of the best shows was in Wimberley, in London. There were about 11,000 to 12,000 people there. The best part though, is to be in a country like Portugal, where hardly any one speaks English, and see them singing the words to your songs as loud as they can.

Intermission: What is your favorite part of touring?

Kilmore: Definitely playing shows and being on stage. Sometimes you get caught up with all the photo shoots and video shoots and press stuff, but when you step out on stage, that's like your home. You look out on the crowd and see all the people that are there to see you, and it's just so real.

Intermission: What goes through your head when you see screaming crazed fans, especially girls, at your concerts?

Kilmore: (Laughs) Aw man, it's so funny because all of those girls are there just to see Brandon. And I kinda laugh at him when we're up there, and he gets all embarrassed about it. But it's great to have your fans. It's very reassuring.

Intermission: Originally you came from Pennsylvania, then struggled in L.A., and joined Incubus in 1997. In comparison to five or six years ago, how has this rush of fame changed your life?

Kilmore: My life is less stressful, and I'm the least-stressed person in the band to begin with. Before it would just be "check-to-check trying to pay rent." But now I have a car, I'm buying a house; I'm growing up. We've finally gotten our success. And the great thing is that it was slow. Each step along the way made us stop and smell the roses. and know that the next year will probably be another one to remember. But don't try to tell me that private schools don't offer something better. They do; it's that simple. For as much as I love my friends and experiences at UMass, if I had a slightly deeper wallet, my address would be the heartland right now. [the band's debut album] came out. Each step takes you further. And I appreciate how it all came about

Smoochy smacks of stupidity

Robin Williams and Edward Norton in the not-too-terrible movie, Death to Smoochy

By Tim Letteney
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Death to Smoochy
Directed by Danny DeVito
Starring Robin Williams and Edward Norton

Danny Devito's new comedy Death to Smoochy is a hilarious film on a conceptual level. Sadly, concepts only carry a movie through a three-minute preview. The characters are rich and multidimensional, the script is clever, and Devito's direction isn't really all that bad. So why oh why does this film fail? One would think that Robin Williams and Edward Norton could carry a film with shear star power – this is not the case.

It's not that Robin Williams doesn't shine in this picture, because he truly does. Williams is a comic genius, and his reinvented comedic direction is refreshing compared to Bicentennial Man and the other junk that he has made in the past few years. Williams's career is on the verge of resurrection, so let's hope that Death to Smoochy doesn't nail him to the ground.

Edward Norton pulls off the tofu-loving Smoochy wonderfully. Although, as Smoochy develops as a character he becomes less believable and the audience cannot truly sympathize with his ambivalence towards what is ethically right and what he truly wants to do...what the hell am I saying?? Norton plays a seven-foot tall pink rhino, not once, is he believable, nor was he intended to be! To hold these characters up to any standard at all would be a discredit to the film. Maybe that is why every critic from Roger Ebert to Stephanie Zacharek gave this film a horrible review.

Death to Smoochy is movie that is not meant to be believable. It is a dumb comedy, which is meant to achieve dumb laughs. I am dumb...I laughed...maybe you're dumb too. I am sitting here trying so hard to give this crappy movie an awful review and I can't. I enjoyed it too much. Death to Smoochy is a ridiculous parody of children's television, so what comes across to the audience is a ridiculous parody of a Hollywood movie. That's the concept no well-paid reviewer can tackle. Critics are taking this movie so seriously that they have forgotten that it is a dumb comedy.

Roeper makes love to his complimentary copy of the Shallow Hal DVD, yet he hails Death to Smoochy as a movie that will be "praised in France or something because it is so incredibly awful." Holy mother of God I hate Richard Roeper! Another reason that this movie has been given such bad reviews is because the reviewers' "prestige" is on the line. If a critic says one positive thing about a movie it will be taken out of context and bulleted onto a trailer staining their name as a respectable critic. Movie critics should not have reputations, they sit on their lazy butts and watch films – they aren't trying to save the world from bad film. They are trying to be a part of Hollywood. No. I am not bitter that I can't get a job...shut up. Ok. the tangent is done.

Now that I have had my moment of realization I can swallow my pride and say that I liked this movie. I laughed my butt off. Sure, the dialogue was unbelievable at times; of course it had no deeper meaning, but why the hell should it? I am not saying that you should buy this movie when it comes out on DVD and VHQ (or whatever it's called). I am saying that you are probably a typical dumb college student and you might like this movie. For, I am a very dumb college student and I liked this movie.

The Rookie
Starring Dennis Quaid
Directed by John Lee Hooker.
Showing at CineMark 12

Spring is in the air. Some sure signs of this are that the birds are chirping, the grass is getting greener, crocuses are beginning to bud. Soon there will be leaves on the trees and flowers blooming. But the real reason why people know that spring is almost here is because April marks the beginning of America's pastime, baseball. And because movie companies know people are sentimental during this time of rejuvenated energy and emotions, the whole sense of rebirth thing, films that deal with family and dreams are as common this time of year as films starring Will Smith are common in the summer.

Disney pictures decided to kill two birds with one stone, going for the sentimental, timeless tale of a man reaching for his dreams (and a true story to boot) with the sport that many people associate with, dream about and idealize: baseball. Disney's The Rookie is the true story of Jim Morris, the oldest rookie pitcher in major league history, who was just getting started at an age when most pitchers retire.

Jim Morris (Dennis Quaid) has lived in Big Lake, Texas for most of his life after getting moved from Virginia, Connecticut and California with his father's (Brian Cox) job in the Navy. Through all these moves he continued to love the game of baseball, and like many small boys dreamed of pitching in the World Series. However, after pitching in junior college, college and minor league ball, Morris suffered a shoulder injury that required several surgeries to correct. He moved back home, started teaching science, married the guidance counselor and started the first high school baseball program in Big Lake, Texas.

Starting a baseball team in a town and region that supports its football team 100 percent isn't easy, and although his ten-kid ball club (when other teams have 25 kids on a team) has a lot of heart, it is without the support of the school or community. They have only won three games in three seasons.

And although he has an OK job, is happily married and has three kids, he still longs to throw his hard stuff – to be able to pitch in the major leagues. One night when the catcher of his team challenges him to throw his "stuff," Morris unleashes the heat. Word spreads fast through the team of his strong revitalized pitching arm and the team strikes up a bargain. If they win districts and get to the state finals, he has to try out for a major league ball club. And in the spirit of Remember the Titans (not-so-coincidentally by the same producing team) they have a remarkable season, winning 14 games in a row.

Agreeing to his part of the bargain, Morris goes to an open tryout for the Tampa Bay Devil Rays, and despite being twenty years older than any of the other players and being accompanied by his three small children, Morris impresses the scouts there. So much that on the answering machine there is five messages from different members of the Devil Rays organization asking to see him again. I don't think I need to tell you what happens, because remember what I said in the second paragraph, "the oldest rookie ever in Major League Baseball."

Unlike other films like The Natural, Field of Dreams, and For The Love of the Game, which combine poetry with the images of baseball (which go almost hand and hand with each other), in The Rookie the sport of baseball is portrayed differently. We don't hear Rachel Griffiths' voice (who plays Jim Morris's wife) during his pitching sequences, like we do in Bull Durham. In fact we don't hear anything except the sound of the game and music that flows with the action. The pure energy portrayed by the teen actors as the play ball characterizes the youthful exuberance that comes with baseball. Watching the sport unfold is what makes watching The Rookie that much fun.

The only problem that I had with the film is that it's two hours and fifteen minutes long. Normally, this isn't a problem, but when the film is rated G, it tends to drag in places. For a film aimed at kids it doesn't have the same high impact action of football like Titans, and at some points feels long and tedious.

Is the film "Disney-fied?" Possibly. But keep in mind that it is a true story. And the rift between Morris and his father, as believable as it was, can be found in other Disney films, like Cool Runnings. And it's not like Disney changed the ending of the film – the true story of Jimmy Morris and his incredible accomplishment to a major league reliever in his mid-thirties throwing 98 miles an hour consistently is a great feel good story. To see it come to life in the movies (like Remember the Titans) gives us all hope in a two hour time period.

because we could have been like those one-hit wonders where it all comes really fast, and then leaves. We've worked hard and been able to appreciate all the little things that have come with the success.

Intermission: You had said that your work is all about texture, not hip-hop. What is the difference?

Kilmore: Where did you hear that?

Intermission: Spin Magazine.

Kilmore: Man, that's bullshit. Hip-hop is me. I am the epitome of hip-hop. I love the textures and scratching, but there is a time and a place for it. Most DJs just come in with their own style and fit the music to what they know. I try to find my niche. I am always experimenting and making my turntabling fit the sound, while creating new sounds too.

Intermission: What bands have really influenced your style or sound?

Kilmore: Public Enemy. They took different sounds and rock samples and mixed them together. Chuck D and Flavor Flav were conscious and powerful. They took the responsibility to back up everything they said. I was really influenced by their lyrics and their music. Like I was saying, the newer DJs today mimic the videos they see, and then there's no new or creative ideas to help the art of DJing. That's why I love making my own sounds.

Intermission: Any thoughts on the legalization of marijuana?

Kilmore: That shit should be legalized. It is not a crime. If you want to smoke out with some of your friends or do it on your own time, I see no problem with it. I do think there should be some rules when you use it, just like with alcohol, but if you're not offending anyone when you use it, it's not such a big deal.

Intermission: What bands are you guys really into now?

Kilmore: Well, we've been out of the country since January, so I really haven't had a chance to hear anything new. I like the Strokes and the Hives, but I'm also into Indian music like Shashila Raymond. A lot of sitars and tablas. I guess my job is to listen to really weird music so that I can bring new sound to the band.

Intermission: Anything you have to say to people at Stanford who don't know you?

Kilmore: You're in for a surprise. We're a very diverse group. We're hard and heavy and melodic and basic, if you can understand that. We go in between and outside of that. At our concerts we have a very giant mix of people. ... But you also have those maniacts during our concerts with the lighters and everyone singing along. "Diversity" is definitely the word though.

Incubus is the kind of rock band you can take home to your parents.

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's gymnastics

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team closed out its season as four individuals competed at the National Collegiate Men's Gymnastics Championships at the Lloyd Noble Center on the campus of the University of Oklahoma on Saturday night. Junior Darren Morace, who competed in the all-around, finished ninth on vault with a score of 9.350, just .025 behind Penn State's Kevin Donohue in eighth place. While none of UMass' four competitors will advance to Saturday night's event finals, which will feature the top eight individuals on each apparatus, Morace will be the first alternate on vault.

Sophomore Patrick McFarlin was the first Minuteman competitor, as the all-arounder began the day on still rings with a 7.850. Morace then posted an 8.900 on vault, while Morace recorded another 8.350 on still rings.

After McFarlin posted an 8.250 on parallel bars, Morace stuck his vault, recording a 9.350. With the score, Morace then stood in fourth place through three rotations.

In the fourth rotation, Morace recorded an 8.100 on parallel bars while McFarlin recorded an 8.250 on horizontal bar. Junior Ben Jacobs joined McFarlin on horizontal bar, and scored an 8.850, bettering his qualifying score by a tenth. McFarlin then recorded an 8.300 on floor exercise, while Morace posted a solid 8.700 on horizontal bar.

In the competition's final rotation, McFarlin recorded a 7.900 on pommel horse while Morace scored 9.050 on floor. Senior Clayton Kent, who joined Morace, also posted a 9.050 on floor exercise.

In the team competition, Oklahoma captured the national title with a team score of 219.500.

The UMass men's gymnastics team posted a 207.100 to finish in fifth place in the second session of the National Collegiate Men's Gymnastics Championships at the Lloyd Noble Center on the campus of the University of Oklahoma on Thursday. While UMass did not advance to the team finals, four Minutemen qualified for individual competition.

The Minutemen began the night on pommel horse, traditionally the team's best event as they entered the day ranked second nationally. UMass did not get off to a good start, as the team posted a 35.400, its lowest in eight meets. McFarlin got off to a great start, recording a 9.200 on the apparatus, the fourth-best score of the evening on pommel horse.

After a 32.850 on still rings in the second rotation, the Minutemen were in fifth place with a team total of 68.250. In the third rotation, UMass scored a 35.975 on vault. It was the team's best mark in five meets, and pushed the Minutemen to 104. Morace stuck a remarkable vault, posting a 9.250.

A solid 33.250 on parallel bars, including a team-best 8.600 by McFarlin, kept the Minutemen in fifth with a team total of 137.475. In the fifth rotation, UMass posted a 34.200 on the horizontal bars to remain ahead of William and Mary by more than two points. Iacobs led the Minutemen on the horizontal bar, posting a 8.800.

In the last event of the evening, the Minutemen recorded a 35.950 on floor exercise. On that event Kent, who was a finalist for the prestigious Nissen-Emery Award, recorded a 9.200 to lead UMass.

Individually, Morace and McFarlin advanced to Friday's finals in the all-around competition [see above]. Morace finished with a 52.475, while McFarlin tallied a 52.425, good for fifth and sixth, respectively. Qualifying for individual event finals, which took place on Friday night as well, were Kent on floor exercise and Iacobs on horizontal bar.

"It's his birthday, he's got a thing for his birthday," Leveille concurred. "Hopefully he'll keep it up and I'm sure he will. He's been doing a lot of the little things great – he just hasn't been scoring. That happens sometimes."

In UMass' prior eight games, Little managed only nine points (four goals, five assists). In his first eight games last year, he had 16 goals and three assists. So to finally break out and play the way he has in the past puts a smile on the face of his coach.

"It's great to see," Cannella said. "We've been waiting for it. He's such a hard-worker maybe at time he was trying a little bit too hard to get it done. But he's done a really good job of tempering that."

Face-off fixings

With the graduation of face-off specialist Jeff Seals, the Minutemen knew it would take some time before they found some consistency in the circle. But it's all starting to come together now as the UMass schedule hits its defining point.

After yesterday's dominating statistics, facing-off is beginning to become less of a worry.

"There's a reason why we have gotten better at facing off," said Cannella, whose troops won 21-of-29 face-offs. "And that's due to the hard work of (Assistant Coach) Terry (Mangan). And Craig Conn and Danny (Paccione). All those guys have really embraced it."

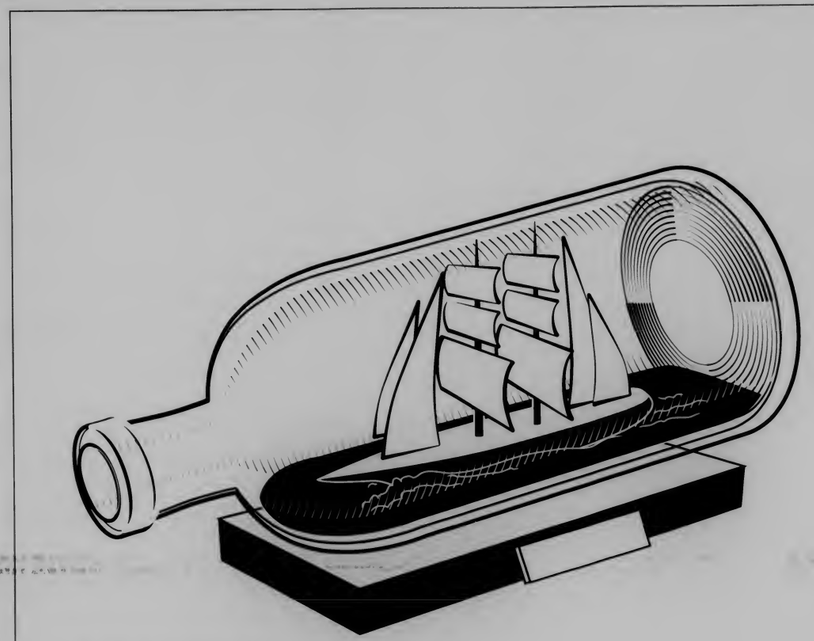
If it wasn't for Conn and Paccione's brilliance at the end of last week's 13-12 win at Penn State, in which they won the last three or four face-offs, UMass would have two losses at present.

"I sort of challenged them, like this is one thing we're weak at and we have to get better," Cannella said. "And they've all done a great job with it."

Opponents extra opportunities

During halftime of Saturday's game, Peter McFarland – the father of Matt, UMass' All-American long-stick defenseman – walked down from the bleachers and delivered some choice words to the three referees huddled at midfield.

"Five EMOs (extra-man opportunities) to none," he shouted, pointing to them. "This is our home field, guys. Don't talk to me, ref the game."



The elder McFarland was referring to the number of penalties the Minutemen had been called for, and the ensuing number of EMOs UMBC had been given in the first half. For the game, the Retrivers had eight EMO's to UMass' two.

But that's nothing new for the rough and tough Minutemen. They have been called for 50 penalties this year, to their opponents' 26.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) What you need to know now is spend some time fine-tuning; the major push is over, now it's time once again to concentrate on the details.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — You may have reason to regret a recent decision today, but before long you'll realize that you are indeed on the right road.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — You needn't take things quite so seriously today — and yet you yourself will surely be taken seriously as you wish, nonetheless.

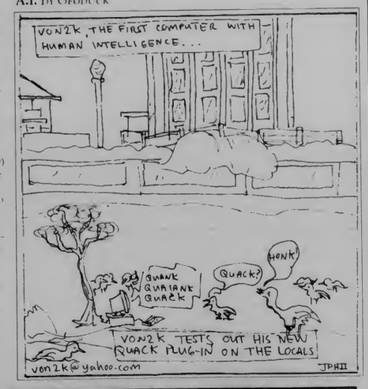
CANCER (June 21-July 22) Don't lose sight of things you must want to attain. It may mean you have to go without something in order to acquire something else.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Someone close to you is likely to want to get even closer today, and the responses he or she gets from you are likely to surprise both of you!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — The more unusual it is, the more you're going to like it — whether at the workplace or at home. You may want someone else to call the shots.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) The unlikely may well prove likely today — and vice versa. You may have to enter a new realm of activity today in order to address certain issues.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — You may come in contact with someone who knows how to make sense of issues you've found difficult or even impenetrable. Try joining forces.



SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — You won't find yourself waiting around too much today; be prepared to swing into action early on — and to keep it up all day long.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Now is no time to neglect your home in any way. Keep things neat and tidy, and don't forget to make those changes and improvements you've planned.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Take care that you're not living too much in your head at this time. Trust something that you're not likely to forget. Take care you don't get burnt out.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — What begins with excitement is likely to develop quickly today into something that you're not likely to forget. Take care you don't get burnt out.

Freshman changes definition

By Eric Soderstrom
COLLEGIAN STAFF

AMHERST – Gene Tundo may be playing in his first season for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team – but he's a freshman no longer – according to coach Greg Cannella.

"He started the Navy game, which was our third game, so a guy with that much experience isn't a freshman anymore," said Cannella after his Minutemen's 18-7 shellacking of the University of Maryland-Baltimore County Saturday at Garber Field. "Yes, you're happy with the way he's playing. But you just hope that he can continue to improve."

UMASS LACROSSE NOTEBOOK

An assists specialist, Tundo's three helpers this weekend brought his nine-game total to 14. To that, the youngster has added five goals.

"He's awesome," said Kevin Leveille, one of UMass' main scoring threats. "He's the best feeder I've seen in a long time, and he's really helping us click on offense. Yeah it's rare he's a freshman, but it's good. It's real good. We have a lot of trust in him and he's doing a great job."

In his first start at Navy, Tundo recorded a goal and three assists. Saturday, Tundo assisted on consecutive goals to Leveille and Dan Paccione at the beginning of the third quarter to give the Minutemen an 11-5 lead and virtually put the game away. He also found Marc Morely a couple minutes later for the quickstick notch that gave UMass a 13-5 advantage.

"Gene is a great compliment to Danny, Marc, all the goal scorers," Cannella said. "He's the guy who finds the open man. He's been really solid in there in big situations, which is a lot to expect from a freshman, but he's done a hell of a job."

Birthday boy

There's something unusual going on with Don Little, his birthday and UMBC. A co-captain for UMass, Little scored three goals to help lead the Minutemen to its blowout victory over the visiting Retrievers. Last year at UMBC, with his birthday under 24 hours away, Little netted a career-high five goal in UMass' 16-6 win.

"I think I have a thing with my birthday and these guys," said Little, who has struggled as of late to find the net. "I took advantage of it last year and I figured I'd do the same this year."

Minutemen roll over UMBC

Stay unbeaten in ECAC play

By Matthew F. Sacco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

AMHERST – Saturday's crucial ECAC contest between the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and UMBC wasn't won on the sunlit Garber Field turf. It was won during the week prior, in the film room and in practice through scouting and preparation.

That's why the Minutemen (8-1, 3-0 ECAC) coasted to an 18-7 victory. Not because they were more skilled, but because when the offense stepped out on the field and UMBC pressed out on them to take away the pass, Kevin Leveille and his teammates had a simple solution: "OK, we'll just run right by them."

UMass	18
UMBC	7

Leveille did exactly that, scoring a season-high four goals in the rout. But his was just one of many UMass names that littered the score sheet. Seniors Don Little and Marc Morley had hat tricks while Dan Paccione, Dusty Smith and Chris Fiore each had a pair.

"We had a lot of guys score today," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "That's a product of being unselfish and playing like a team."

Freshman crease attack Gene Tundo pushed his team-leading assist total to 14 with three assists in the third quarter.

"He's awesome," Leveille said. "He's the best feeder I've seen in a long time. He's doing a great job."

The Minutemen jumped on UMBC early, with four straight goals to start the game and a 5-2 lead at the end of the first quarter. UMass duplicated the four-goal burst at the beginning of the second frame to build a 9-2 lead, but Justin Smith did his best to keep the Retrievers in it.

Smith, who led UMBC with a hat trick and a helper, scored at 4:02 to make it 9-3 before assisting on Matt Chase's tally and scoring his second of the game just seconds later to cut the deficit to four at halftime.

But UMass would not let the contest get any tighter, as the Minutemen tacked on four more goals in a five minute span of the third quarter to take a 13-5 lead. UMBC did not have another run in them as the home squad cruised.

Whatever the Retrievers threw at them, UMass was ready for it.

"Our coaches have done a super job," Cannella said.

Leveille was ready to all but embarrass long pole midfielder Greg Wojtech, who marked him for most of the game. Matt McFarland was ready to put UMBC leading scorer Josh Gerber on lock down. And the face-off tandem of Craig Conn and Paccione were ready to win 21 of 29 draws on the afternoon.

"There's a reason why we've gotten better at facing off," Cannella said. "[Assistant Coach] Terry Mangan works with those guys every practice. And Conn and Paccione have worked really hard at it."

The Minutemen were dominant in every statistical category, not just in the face-off circle. UMass outshot its opponent 54-23 on the day while picking up 17 more groundballs and holding the Retrievers to a 15-for-27 performance on clears.

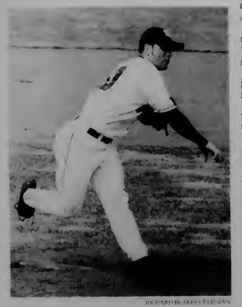
Bill Schell was a rock in the crease for the Minutemen. The freshman made 13 saves on 20 UMBC shots on goal while his counterpart struggled. Tim Flanagan made only nine saves while allowing all 18 UMass goals before being pulled with over 11 minutes left in the final stanza.

The Minutemen also won the penalty war, although it's not a victory Cannella would like to take often. UMass took six more penalties than the Retrievers and was in the box for five and a half more minutes. The man down unit did respond, however, as it held UMBC to a 3-for-8 performance with the extra man.

The UMass victory pushes its win streak to eight overall and three in conference, as it sets up a virtual conference championship game with Georgetown in Washington D.C. two weeks from now. Before that contest, the Minutemen have a date with Yale in New Haven, Conn. and a midweek contest at home against Harvard.

UMBC, on the other hand, finishes off the conference season with a 2-3 record and no shot at the ECAC's automatic qualifier.

Pitching woes continue when Santos is off mound



Staff struggles after ace's first game win

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

AMHERST – The Massachusetts baseball team (8-14, 2-7 Atlantic 10) hosted a first base giveaway at Earl Lorden Field yesterday as 15 members of the Dayton Flyer baseball squad were sent to first without having to make contact with a pitch.

Dayton	4	8	11
UMass	9	7	6

The Flyers (17-8, 7-2 A-10) increased a one-run lead to three in the top of the seventh inning when Andy Bochmer dropped a line drive in front of centerfielder Derrick Durepo. The freshman misplayed the ball, allowing it to hop over his glove and roll long enough for Bochmer to round the bases, making the score 8-3.

RICHARD BLAKELY/COLLEGIAN

Jesse Santos picked up his fourth win of the season in game one of Saturday's doubleheader.

The Flyers added three more runs in the final two innings, while the Minutemen could only muster one in the bottom of the ninth, making the final 11-6.

The three-game series was a good example of the problems currently facing the Maroon and White. The team has had trouble finding pitching behind ace Jesse Santos, and can't seem to put enough runs on the board to earn the win.

UMass pitchers walked 11 batters in this game alone, including four in the first 1⅔ inning. Combined with two infield hits off starter Scott Ratliff, the Flyers jumped out to a 5-0 lead in the first.

The Minutemen got on the board in the bottom of the inning when senior Aaron Senez, who has been an impossible out for opposing pitchers all season long, doubled and scored on an error.

"He's been great," Head Coach Mike Stone said of his captain. "Regardless of the score or how we have struggled, he has played very, very well."

The Maroon and White tied the game up at five apiece in the bottom of the third when Senez and junior Chris Morgan hit back-to-back homeruns. Senez's was a three run jack that left the bases empty for Morgan's.

"I've been seeing the ball well and had some opportunities with some guys out," Senez said after the game. "That is when you have got to feel like you are going to get the hit. You have got to battle."

"It's baseball, though," Senez added, not wanting to jinx his play. "You have got to take it day-by-day. It can go away real fast."

In the end, Senez battled to a 4-for-5 performance with four RBIs and two runs scored. His average currently sits at .397.

Senior right-hander Brian Hourigan, who replaced Ratliff with one out in the first, pitched well for the Minutemen. The Beacon Falls, Conn. native pitched into the eighth inning and gave up four runs (one earned), including two on the Bochmer hit. Hourigan was forced to come out of the game in the top of the eighth inning with one out, due to reaggravating an injury.

"He's got a problem in his back," Stone said. "He developed it last weekend. It flared up again."

Hourigan was replaced by sophomore Eric Chown, who got out of the inning after allowing an inherited runner to score.

Sophomore Matt Mitchell began the ninth, but was pulled after giving up two runs and hitting two batters. Classmate Brandon White struck out the only batter he faced to end the top of the ninth.

UMass began the three-game series with a doubleheader Saturday.

Santos had another solid outing in game one, leading the Minutemen to a 9-4 win. The Chelmsford, Mass. native improved to 4-1 on the season and held the Flyers scoreless for the first six innings before allowing four runs in the final inning. Santos struck out five while scattering nine hits.

The Maroon and White scored at least one run in five out of its six turns at bat. UMass jumped out to a 1-0 lead in the second and added two more in the third when sophomore Adam Stojanowski drilled a two-run double.

The Minutemen scored four more runs in the next inning behind RBI singles from Durepo, senior Mike Kulak and sophomore Cullen Maumus.

Junior Jeff Altieri, who had been struggling in the season's early going, broke out of his slump with a 3-for-3 performance.

"I've been staying after all week in practice and taking a lot of extra swings," Altieri said. "I felt real comfortable at the plate."

The Whitinsville, Mass. native would add a 3-for-4 performance during the second game of the doubleheader later that afternoon.

Following yesterday's 2-for-4 outing, Altieri has raised his batting average all the way up to .306.

Stone was happy that his first baseman was breaking out of his slump, but added, "We need to have more people playing well... because we struggle scoring runs and we struggle getting people out."

Saturday's second game was a heartbreaker for the Maroon and White as Dayton third baseman Aaron Reesh drove in the winning run in the final inning on a sacrifice fly off Chown.

The game-winner came immediately after a two-run sixth inning by the Minutemen that tied the game at 7-7. Senez brought the team within one with an RBI triple and Altieri drove him in with a single to tie it up.

All three games were played in cold weather, but Stone and Altieri both claimed that the temperature didn't have any affect on the team's play.

"It is just part of playing in Massachusetts," Stone said. "It didn't effect the way the games were played."

Altieri agreed. "It's something you forget about when you are out there playing," he said.

UMass will hit the diamond again on Tuesday against Holy Cross. Game time is set for 3 p.m.

RICHARD BLAKELY/COLLEGIAN

It wasn't Jeff Altieri's glove that had been the problem before this weekend, it was his bat. Now, both are fine.

A group of Resident Assistants and RA Union supporters occupied a variety of administrative offices on campus, including that of Interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams, the Campus News Office, the halls and offices of Residence Life Management and the office of Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Javier Cevallos, in that order.

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Over two dozen Resident Assistant union activists at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst took over several campus offices yesterday.

The protest began at approximately 11:15 a.m. when 26 protestors, upset over the University's Mar. 26 refusal to negotiate, marched into the chancellor's office at 374 Whitmore Building and demanded to speak with interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams. Upon being told that Williams was in Boston, the protestors sat down in the office and chanted.

Union representatives maintain that the University's refusal to bargain with the union is illegal under Massachusetts labor laws.

"The University is breaking the law, and they're using public money to hire union-busting lawyers," said Kendra McDade, a union member. "They're not acting with integrity."

"We've done everything legal up to this point," said Pat Colvario, an RA.

Tim Scott, an organizer for United Auto Workers Local 2322, which represents the RAs, concurred with the students.

"We're here because the University feels that it doesn't have to play by the rules," Scott said. "We're not going to stand by and let UMass break the law."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos spoke with the RAs, telling them to leave, before public safety was called. Two plain-clothes officers were already on the scene. Cevallos believes that the law was misapplied when the Massachusetts Labor Relations Board certified the March 5 ratification vote of the RAs and Community Development Assistants (CDAs) in favor of unionization.

"Massachusetts law has very specific provisions for appealing a decision," Cevallos said. "It was the wrong decision."

Protestors said that Cevallos had vowed to fight them in court, and it would take three or four years to resolve.

"That was a mistake on my part," Cevallos said. "These things take time."

The activists were told at 11:35 a.m. that they had to leave the office in five minutes, or they would face arrest. The protestors marched out through the provost's office and went to Munson Hall, where they shouted slogans in the News Office before marching over to Berkshire House, the home of Housing Services and Residence Life Management. Activists entered the office of Michael Gilbert, director of Housing Services. Gilbert looked on in silence as the RAs walked by, chanting and holding up signs.

Legislators visit campus, learn of budget impact

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Several state legislators visited the University of Massachusetts at Amherst yesterday.

Thirteen districts were represented in the visit, which was organized by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA). Legislators took a tour of the campus and spoke with students about the recent budget cuts, and how they have affected the University.

"[The visit] to tell legislators how much we love our campus," said Kerry Mulcahy, the Student Director of SCERA.

Representatives Mary Jane Simmons (D-Leominster), Emile Gouen (D-Fitchburg), Dan Keenan (D-Agawam), Anne Gobi (D-Barre) sent aides to represent them at the meeting. Senators Brian Lees (D-1st Hampden and Hampshire) and Mike Knapik (D-2nd Hampden and Hampshire) also sent legislative aides. In attendance were Representatives Stephen Buoniconti (D-Chicopee), Ellen Story (D-Amherst), Reed Hillman (R-Brimfield), Jose Santiago (D-Lawrence/Methuen), Michael Kane (D-Holyoke) and John Merrigan (D-Bernardston) and Senator Stanley Rosenberg, (D-Hampshire and Franklin). The legislators also listened to testimonials about the effects of budget cuts.

"Budget cuts are compromising the quality of this campus," said Ian Trefethen, a Psychology sophomore.

Sen. Rosenberg also gave a presentation on the importance of the University to the Commonwealth, and promised that he and like-minded colleagues would fight for UMass.

"We'll do our best to be of help," Rosenberg said.

The legislators commented on how much they learned in their visit.

"I learned a lot of things," said Rep. Story. "I didn't know that there were 90 majors to choose from."

Story was impressed with the professionalism of the students who hosted the legislators.

"Amanda Weaver was an absolutely professional tour guide," Story said. "If any other university wants to have legislators visit a campus, they should get in touch with Kerry [Mulcahy] and SCERA.

"I think that the [legislators] who came today that thought it was worth the trip," Story added. "Any cuts to the University should be as little as possible. The University got more than its share this year. It's too much of an asset."

Legislators learned the effect the budget cuts have been having on academic programs.

"It's a huge eye-opening experience to come to the flagship campus of the University," Rep. Kane said. "And to hear the impact that [budget cuts] will have on many of the smaller departments. They can't absorb the loss in revenue."

The revenue shortfalls can only be halted, Kane said, by increasing revenues collected – in short, raising taxes. The problem, Kane said, is that acting Governor Jane Swift has promised to veto any proposed tax increase.

"Every time the House and Senate has passed a tax measure before the General Court, [the bills] only passed by four or five votes," Kane explained.

Kane said it is difficult to get the two-thirds majority to override the governor's veto. Representative Merrigan explained that the revenue shortfalls took everyone by

Once in the office, Colvario read aloud two sections of Massachusetts General Law Chapter 150E, which concerns labor relations of public employees. Section two of this law reads, "Employees shall have the right of self-organization and the right to form, join, or assist any employee organization for the purpose of bargaining collectively through representatives of their own choosing on questions of wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and to engage in lawful, concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, free from interference, restraint, or coercion."

Section 10(a) states that it is a "prohibited practice for a public employer" to "refuse to bargain collectively in good faith" with unions.

Gilbert refused to comment, as did Dawn Briggs, the business manager for Housing Services. Briggs also witnessed the protest.

The RAs left Berkshire at approximately 12:20 p.m. and returned to Whitmore. This time they entered the reception area of Cevallos' office and demanded to speak with the vice chancellor.

Cevallos appeared and Colvario read to him the state statutes. Colvario also read portions of an editorial that ran in the April 2 Washington Post that supported the RA union.

Cevallos listened to the RAs, but within minutes acting chief of police Barbara O'Connor and two uniformed officers arrived. The protestors dispersed after a few minutes, withdrawing to the handicap access ramp. Colvario and Scott thanked the crowd, which now numbered more than 30, and the RAs left. Scott said this wouldn't be the last the administration heard from the RA union.

"This was just a warning shot," Scott said.

Hampshire Hair Drive looking for long locks

By Jennifer Eastwood
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Students will sponsor a Hair Drive at the South Lounge of the Robert Crown Center at Hampshire College today from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. The hair donations, accepted from five inches in length and up, will be sent to the Locks of Love foundation and used to make wigs for children who have lost their hair due to illness.

Bonnie Obrenski, a freshman Journalism major at Hampshire College and a co-organizer of the event, explained that 12 stylists, each in shifts of four throughout the day, will be donating their time in order to cut and style donators' hair. The stylists represent the studios Hair East in Amherst, Hair Fix in Auburn and the Northampton salons of Lutu's Hair & Tanning Salon and Mane Tamers.

"It all started this past summer when I decided to cut my hair short, and I wanted to donate it," Obrenski recalled. "That was the point I decided I'd want to organize something like this when I got to college."

Obrenski and the drive's other co-organizer, Shira Granote, began their search by signing up for a volunteer's packet from Locks of Love, which consisted of various pamphlets on the organization and a press release form. They have been arranging the event since January 2002.

"A lot of people think the hair is just for wigs for cancer patients, but it's really not," Obrenski noted. "Cancer patients will have their hair grow back eventually. Lock of Love also provides wigs for children with the [hair loss] disease alopecia. There's no known cause for it, but kids who have the disease will never have their hair grow back."

Granote, a freshman pre-med student at Hampshire College, shared Obrenski's sentiment of a want to aid her community.

"It was the idea of helping, of bringing community service to a level where students could easily help out that attracted me to the drive," she said. "I work with special needs kids, so [working for children's benefits is] something I'm really passionate about."

Those who have made appointments will have priority in receiving a stylist, the organizers noted, but walk-ins are welcomed. All donors should come to the event with clean, damp hair.

Although still unsure of her expectations for the drive itself, Caroline Lavin, a hair stylist at Hair East, is looking forward to the event, in which she will be donating her time and skill as a stylist from 2 to 5 p.m.

"It's for good cause, and I love to cut long hair," Lavin said. "I love to help people make the change over like that... from long hair to short."

Kathy Rogers, a Mane Tamers hair stylist working at the drive from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. agreed on the importance of the cause.

"We all know someone in our lives who has cancer, so I'm happy to do it for that reason," she explained.

Locks of Love will use hair donations five inches in length to either make short wigs, generally geared towards young males, or sell the hair to retail companies manufacturing wigs, one of the ways in which the company receives its funding. Donations larger than that are directly used for Locks of Love hairpieces.

"I just want to tell people to think outside of selfishness," Granote concluded. "For most people, hair will grow back, but not so with many of those children."

Monetary donations for Locks of Love will also be accepted at the event.

Amnesty back in action

By Peter Preston
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Amnesty International is seeking to reestablish an active chapter at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Since going non-active this year, Amnesty has been looking to regain student support and enrollment.

"Amnesty International is a human rights organization that campaigns against rights abuses such as the death penalty, torture and other cruel treatment of prisoners, and unfair trials for political prisoners," said Anura Cheryan, who is Amnesty International's UMass Intern.

Amnesty has approximately one million members in over 160 countries and territories. Subscriptions and donations from its worldwide members largely fund amnesty projects.

Amnesty in the Five College Area has sponsored many political prisoners wrongfully imprisoned by writing letters to international governments, including China and Egypt. It has also co-sponsored events aimed at ending partner abuse and other domestic violence against women.

Once reactivated at UMass, "Amnesty is hoping to gain support from both students and faculty and to generate local interest in global problems," Cheryan said of Amnesty's future goals for the UMass chapter.

Events recently sponsored by Amnesty include International Women's Day, which was held in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union, and The Vagina Monologues, a collection of poems, plays, and readings all written from a unique woman's point of view.

"I think that both went well. We had a good turnout, which will hopefully lead to a good number of enrollment in the new chapter," Cheryan responded when asked about the success of the two events.

One of the upcoming events to be co-sponsored by Amnesty and the University Gallery's "Culture of Violence" Exhibit is titled "Exploring American Violence and its Historical Roots." This will be a panel discussion led by Professor Sut Jhally of the Communication Department, several members of the Women's Studies Department, and other distinguished guests. Topics to be discussed include the gender images and the normalization of violence, the welfare state and its relation to battered women, and how institutional violence leads to interpersonal violence.

There will be a general interest meeting tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge, located in the Student Union, at 7 p.m. For more information on Amnesty International, attend the general interest meeting tonight or visit www.amnesty.org.

surprise.

"We had been riding a bubble in the stock market," Merrigan explained. "We were building programs, and then the bubble [worth $700 million dollars] popped."

The voter approved tax rollbacks have also caused a problem, Merrigan said.

"Then you take [the tax rollbacks] and it [the deficit] is another billion dollars," Merrigan added.

While most of the legislators were from Western Massachusetts, Rep. Santiago traveled two and a half hours to visit UMass.

"I like to know how [the budget cuts] are affecting our children's education," Santiago said. "The University of Massachusetts provides a tremendous service to the communities, especially Lawrence, and the budget cuts hurt communities when you have a tuition hike. It puts a hardship on those kids."

Santiago explained that bilingual education, which is usually threatened by budget cuts, needs to be protected for students to have an equal opportunity to succeed.

"It would be an injustice to the many immigrants who come to the United States for an education," Santiago said.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Airline study encouraging

But results mean nothing yet

Finally, one positive has appeared from the September 11 debacle. According to an annual study taken by two University of Nebraska at Omaha professors, customer service on airlines has dramatically improved in the past year, and especially since September 11.

Results of the study suggest that fewer passengers are being bumped from their flights, fewer bags are being lost, and more flights are leaving on time now than in the past year. Statistics for flight timeliness, lost baggage, customer complaints, and customers getting bumped from flights all improved significantly, according to the study.

"They were doing great before they got to September 11. After September 11, with a more rational system – fewer passengers, fewer airplanes, fewer flights – it worked better," said study co-author Dean Headley, an associate professor of marketing at Wichita State University.

This is all well and great – but there's a catch. September 11 and the increased security thereafter kept travelers away from airports for several months. While customers struggled to get through security – many customers were told to arrive two hours before their flight time to ensure that they would make their flights – the decrease in overall flight traffic made it easy for airlines to improve on their customer service. Airline customer service improved more thanks to decreased business and decreased numbers willing to fly after 9-11 as to any kind of changes that any airline companies made.

So what will customer service and security be like in the fall? The Federal Aeronautics Association (FAA) said last month that passenger levels will not return to pre-September 11 conditions until next year, but it is important to remember just that – they WILL. How good will customer service be once that happens? How good will security be? Which one of them will be sacrificed once the number of passengers increases on flights again and the pressure mounts on airline administrations?

The airline administration should be commended for improving upon one of their trouble areas, customer service. But it can't stop there. Security – for all of the long lines and waits – remains in many ways suspect. Weapons have been sneaked through since 9-11 with alarming ease, in some cases.

Airlines need to increase security while keeping customer service levels up. If that doesn't sound easy, it's because it probably isn't. Nevertheless, it needs to be done. It will take creativity and an open mind to push both at once, but more than anything else right now, that is what travelers need for their own piece of mind. Because in all actuality, security IS the first key to customer service on airlines. If passengers are not safe on their airlines once numbers increase to the levels that they were at before, a fluffy pillow will mean nothing. Reasonably guaranteeing safety is good customer service. Period.

Foreign languages not all bad

There is nothing wrong with a foreign language requirement. For my purposes here, let's set aside the fact that our language program is inadequate and understaffed at the moment and let's just focus on the pros and cons of studying a language different from that of our own.

Foreign language and I have always had a love/hate relationship. When we met, I was a fledgling sixth-grader – class-clown, outspoken, loving every minute of being twelve years old. Then I met French. French had a pencil-thin mustache and always wore a beret while eating a baguette. Our textbook was titled "French is Fun." "French is Fun" had a drawing of French cyclists, probably doing the Tour de France.

This language component was the first attempt my small inadequate Catholic school made at teaching us a language. It didn't succeed. We didn't even use the book. We played Simone Dit (Simon Says) and Lotto (Bingo). Needless to say I learned numbers and body parts, and that is all. The next year (grade seven), the attempt was Spanish. Only this time, they had some kid's mother come in and do it.

Mrs. Esposito was a native Spanish speaker. She taught us some introductory phrases and numbers. She must have realized she wasn't being paid because she left after a week. I still have my notebook. "Spanish class" consumed exactly a half a page.

When entering high school, I told my guidance counselor that I would be comfortable in French II Honors because I had excelled at basic parlor games conducted in French just four short years before. The first day went quite well. Everyone introduced themselves, their hobbies, and told summer camp stories – all in perfect French. When it was my turn, I told them I had a head, a nose and feet, and then counted to ten. I never returned to that French class. The next year I started Spanish and, (gasp) I actually learned stuff.

Upon my arrival to UMass I didn't take the language placement exam because I decided I would study Italian. I would become tri-lingual. I would impress people with my knowledge of fine wines and study art for a semester in Florence. I would be able to pronounce anything on the Bertucci's menu, and therefore inspire awe in all those around me. Things became not so bene (good) when I failed Italian my freshman year due to some unsightly 10:10 scheduling teamed with Thursday night parties and Friday morning quizzes. Today, I can still say "Thatsa spicy meataball," with complete confidence, but that's where it stops.

"The question is, is taking a foreign language class so much to ask? I really don't think so."

So on I went to Spanish 110 and 120. I figured I was going to review stuff I had learned in high school and it would be easy; it was. And for my last six credits of Spanish, I studied in Spain, spending one month in a beautiful city instead of two miserable semesters in a dusty room in Herter doing Intercambios. Now that I look back, learning a language was kind of a pain in the ass. But in the long run, I'm a better person for it and can enjoy Univision's numerous soaps.

A lot of schools don't require students to study a foreign language. Good for them. The question is, is taking a foreign language class so much to ask? I really don't think so. I might be singing a different tune had I not spent my last six credits having fun in the sun in Spain, but a second language is beneficial. Knowing a second language is a lovely addition to graduating senior's resume. Learning the linguistic rules of another tongue also help you to better understand your own. And let's not forget that if you should one day travel to the particular country whose language you've studied, you'll be able to at least hail a taxi and exchange money. Studying a different language can lead you to a semester abroad and to become one with a place so distant you never even fathomed traveling there.

The foreign language classes I've taken have also taught me culture and customs different from that of our own, and this can never be a bad thing. A learning experience is a learning experience. If the language department had an appropriate budget and a sufficient amount of teachers, the requirement could be tolerable, successful even. If you're not taking a language class for those semesters what are you going to do? Take more meaningless gen-eds or gym classes? Let's not knock an alternate way of learning just because our school is struggling. The bottom line is that we're a school based on diversity and acceptance, and a language requirement is an excellent way to express that.

Whither UMass?

Save UMass trip planned

THOMAS ROBERTS

Each semester, some 3,400 students enroll in Sociology courses. These courses, ranging from your typical 100-level gen-ed to specialized courses in criminology and social movements, are taught by top-level professors and graduate students. However, the Sociology Department is now faced with the loss of seven out of 23 faculty members this semester, none of whom will be replaced. As a result, a maximum of 2,500 students can be accommodated in Sociology classes next fall. Randall Stokes, the Departmental Chair of Sociology, also says he does not know how much discretionary money his department will have for specialized programs next semester. Because so many departments will be competing for scarce resources, and despite the enormous demand from students and the nation for the program, it is highly likely its prestigious Criminal Justice program will have to be eliminated.

This story is unfortunately not unique. Departments across campus are reeling from the budget cuts. To name but a few, Music & Dance lost over $600,000 of support and 11 faculty members; Communication will see its major student to faculty ratio increase to over 70:1 even though it will be forced to drop over 300 students as majors; the Commonwealth College has decreased its requirements for graduation and will recruit far fewer students than in the past; the Foreign Language Resource Center is gone and all the languages will be collapsed into one department, with Comparative Literature stuffed inside, while professors and graduate student teaching assistants are removed; scholarships, bilingual education support, students with disabilities support services, infrastructure maintenance, child care facilities, and security guards to protect students are all being severely cut or eliminated; the Library's acquisitions budget has been slashed by 80% and will NOT BUY BOOKS for the remainder of the year! What kind of a university does not buy books for its Library?! How did this happen? How much more can we expect? What can we do about it?

When asking why we are at this dismal spot, most people would point to Republican Gov. Jane Swift or to the Democratic leadership of Rep. Tom Finneran in the state legislature. They squabbled away until almost December before putting out a budget that pulled 6.2% of funds from higher education (the overall state budget dropped by only 2.8%), which translated into a $15 million cut to UMass-Amherst. The neglect of public education has been a long-standing feature of Massachusetts state politics. Before the current budget cuts (there was another one about a decade ago), Massachusetts already ranked 48th in the nation for supporting higher ed per capita, and we are the only state in the country where, by law, tuition payments go to the state and not back into the university. Moreover, Governors Swift and Celluci pushed Proposition Four onto last year's ballot precisely because it did not have support in the legislature. The $1.2 billion tax cut geared disproportionately to the wealthy has yet to take effect, though, and Jane Swift has already indicated the need for further cuts in social services to support the tax cut. Even after the $1,495 fee increase for next year, we will still face a shortfall. So, watch out UMass – good times are not ahead.

To be fair, not all our problems stem from the state legislature. Misappropriations, bloated administrative salaries, and illogical program cuts all originate within our own campus. Just as the Chancellor and Provost ask faculty to forgo raises, or retire altogether, they refuse to accept the undergraduate Student Governance Association's Fair Share Act (February 6, 2002) and take a pay cut themselves. This comes after several raises and the fact that a full third of employees paid in six-figures are administrators. Furthermore, the University continues to expend money on unproven programs. Distance Learning initiatives, for example, have already cost over $15 million. The plan continues unabated, just as New York University announced it will dismantle its own Distance Learning program. Athletics lost over $2 million a year, but those sports that drain the coffers the most get new coaches and gear while women's gymnastics, a recent national champion, has been eliminated. Pressure must be placed on our own administration to respond to the state legislature's action with intelligence and self-sacrifice, not by placing us and our university's standing on the chopping block.

But we don't have to take all this idly. The coalition of students, faculty, staff, and parents, called Save UMass (www.saveumass.org), has emerged to defend our rights to quality, public education. As a start, last month's teach-in generated nearly 10,000 letters to legislators and parents. Tom Finneran dismissed the act as "a bunch of academic noise." Perhaps that was the point. I think it's time we made a lot more noise as well!

On Thursday, April 25, students from all the UMass campuses, as well as state community colleges, will converge on Boston to let the legislature hear us loudly and clearly. The aim will be to save higher education: repeal the tax cut, let tuition stay on campuses, cut administrator salaries, and cut wasteful spending on non-academic programs. Buses will be going from our campus out there; to get on the bus, see the Save UMass table in the front of the Student Union and sign-up! Working together, and with one clear voice, we can still save the University.

Random thoughts from inside a UMass mind

SEAN JACQUET

All right, since I got my nice, lighthearted, feel-good column out of the way, I'm back to being an unrelenting prick. So, let's get started.

Hey, Jose Offerman was on pace to hit 162 home runs. I smell MVP.

Pedro Martinez made his first start of the season with horrifying results. Martinez, who bulked up to 190 pounds in the off-season, went three innings, giving up six earned runs. His ERA was 18.00 after arguably the worst outing of his career. But don't worry: it's far too early to panic. Pedro will most likely turn it around. And besides, Boston sports fans have a lot to be thankful for. The Pats won the Super Bowl, Ty Law hasn't been caught with any E lately, Paul Pierce hasn't been stabbed in months, and Roger Clemens got roughed up as badly as Pedro the other day. See. There are plenty of reasons to remain positive until Pedro returns to form.

George Bush hasn't done anything too stupid in the past few weeks, but I still think he's a stooge.

A friend of mine suggested that the world would be a better place without religion. No religion? But who would tell people what to think? What reason would people use to kill each other? Who would instill the fear of eternal damnation to keep us in line while all the while allowing pedophiles to work within their ranks? Who would disguise the truth so that millions of followers would never question a history and ideology so obviously faulted? What invisible man would I pray to? Who would demand we hate people based on their sexual orientation? Who would do the fighting in Ireland and the Middle East? No religion? But it has so many uses.

Speaking of religion, some believe the United States should take a more active role in ending the violence in the Middle East. That makes sense. I mean, who better than the U.S. to teach the Israelis and the Palestinians how not to arbitrarily kill innocent citizens of other nations. We could also teach them a thing or two about tolerance, and accepting other viewpoints. Throughout its history, the U.S. has always been a beacon of acceptance. Unless you're black. Or poor. Or gay. Or a Native American. Or a woman. Or ...

Every time I go for a drink of water in the dorms, there's always something in the fountain that doesn't belong. Listen, I've enough shit in my life without having to stare at a wad of lung butter every time I want a drink. It's not a spittoon, it's a drinking fountain. Saliva doesn't belong. If you want to spit, do it in the bathroom, a trash can, or swallow it. Just don't blow a snot-rocket where people go for a drink of water.

Can you tell that I really don't have much to complain about this week?

On the bright side, it seems we've buried the asinine phrase "the terrorists have won." There will never be more sorry logic for why people should fly on a plane, or drop serious money to help the economy.

The Enron people haven't met with the UMass administration like I've advised. That's all right because I have a third party: high-ranking officials of the Catholic Church. They could share secrets with the Enron people about covering up a serious crime and deliberately lying to suppress incriminating evidence. They could also talk to UMass about their gross mismanagement of their respective crises. Imagine that. Maybe Kenneth Lay, Cardinal Law, and Billy Bulger can get a picture together. It would be the perfect tribute to honesty and competence.

I'm applying for a job at the Big Y, and I'm a little hesitant. I don't have much choice, because I need the dough, especially after that $145 ticket. Dammit! Anyway, I'm not looking forward to this given my past experiences with bagging groceries and being a cashier. During one glorious summer working at Cumberland Farms for a robust $7.50/hour, I dealt with some delightful people. The majority of the time, however, I dealt with idiots. There were the lottery junkies who would come in buy a ticket, scratch it, and buy another one. This cycle would repeat until the moron ran out of money or realized they wouldn't hit the $1 million dollar jackpot that night. Sometimes they'd go to their car to scratch their tickets, but they'd always come back, thus renewing my annoyance.

Then there were the people that would bitch when they would have to wait in line. Everyone seems to think he/she is too important for that. Listen, if you're in such a hurry, you shouldn't have stopped to buy that Snickers. Don't huff and puff when you find some idiot at counting out the $2.61 in nickels and pennies to buy a pack of Mustang cigarettes. It's your fault for stopping. Don't yap at me because God forbid you had to wait a few extra seconds. If you would just be patient I'll have your fat, sorry ass on your way and renting porn before the store closes.

Next comes my favorite, the "back room." An astounding number of customers asked me if there was any more of a particular item in the "back room," proving how stupid people really are. People seem to think there exists some magical place within the convenience store where there is an endless supply of whatever it is they need. There isn't, and it only makes you sound dumb when you ask.

Some people complicate matters with inane chatter. They talk about the weather, school, work, or even worse, themselves. Forced conversation is uncomfortable for everyone, so let's just conduct our business in silence. That way I don't have to listen to you or anything about your life. I want to be done with you as quickly as you want to be done with me.

Sadly, there's been no progress in the fight to maintain quality orange juice in the DCs. If you're all as dedicated to this fight as I am (and I'm sure you all are), let your voice be heard. Stage a protest. To hell with the budget cut rally in Boston, we've got bigger fish to fry. Let's unite. The man can't hold us down forever.

Elena, I'm kind of a superstitious person and last week my friend read my tarot cards and I got a really bad reading! It said I'm going to marry a woman that brings me misery and the death card kept coming up. Later that day I also got a bad horoscope reading. Now I feel like I'm doomed! Should I buy into this? What is your opinion on tarot cards, psychics, horoscopes etc.?
– Danny C.

When I was a wee child, I used to hide from the eerie looking black cat that liked to creep behind me on my way home from elementary school. Of course, living in Peabody, MA, which was part of Salem during the witch trial days, probably contributed to my fascination and fear of the supernatural and clairvoyant people. I started reading horoscope books when I was eight, and by age 11 my younger, bratty cousin somehow convinced me to call one of those Miss Cleo types. I only stayed on the phone for a couple minutes but my parents still got charged and pretty much laid the smack down!

Since my childhood, I have become a lot more comfortable with people possessing psychic prowess. In fact, I had my tarot cards read by my friend and Salem native for the first time only last year, as the thought of knowing my future used to terrify me! She made me feel a lot more comfortable about the reading by telling me that the cards are all subject to change. If you alter one thing about your life, the entire reading can shift! It could be as subtle as changing around your class schedule during pre-registration or starting a new job. Every action we take has effects and consequences.

So don't stress too much about the daunting death card, as it definitely does not mean you're going to keel over tomorrow! Most likely it means the death or end of something in your life like the end of a relationship or the end of a phase.

Also, you just may have been so nervous while shuffling the cards and perhaps you did not focus enough on the reading. Sometimes, thinking about death and doom will sometimes send those cards to the top of your deck. One of my friend's "customers" told us that he kept thinking about sex over and over in his head and sure enough, that card surfaced.

So relax and take a deep breath next time you get your cards read, while focusing on the important realms of your existence that you would like to explore like relationships, careers, love, travel etc. And take any advice that you receive with a grain of salt, as your next reading may slightly or even vastly differ depending on circumstances.

Readings that I have received typically vary but some elements remain the same. For example, a card featuring a dashing blond man has been emerging as of late. Yet, that certainly doesn't mean that I am going to shun that tall, dark, handsome stranger in favor of a bleach blond surfer dude straight out of Cali. My soul mate

Van Wilder all the gross out you need

Ryan Reynolds gets close to Tara Reid in Van Wilder while a bunch of frat guys get close to a dog's... Ummm. Yeah.

By Kurt Polesky

NATIONAL LAMPOON'S VAN WILDER
Directed by Walt Becker
Starring Ryan Reynolds and Tara Reid
Playing at CineMark, Hadley

Start with the obligatory gross out humor, throw in some scantily clad girls in bikinis, and a boy meets girl story (complete with the big screen kiss at the end), and you've got National Lampoon's Van Wilder. Oh yeah, and the whole thing takes place at a college, "Coolidge College" to be precise, a place which may (?) have been modeled after our very own University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Surprisingly, Van Wilder actually has some semblance of a plot. Van Wilder is the name of the lead character (Ryan Reynolds) who is a campus legend in his seventh year in the University. Along with his assistant Taj (Kal Penn) and sidekick (Teck from "The Real World") he rules the University, gaining adulation from babes and respect from guys. He also posseses an uncanny ability to throw a killer party – earning him his nickname "Party Liaison." But alas, there is trouble in the air when Van Wilder's father (Tim Matheson) refuses to continue to pay the tuition check for his seventh year undergrad of a son. Van Wilder's plan to raise money: plan parties for people. Along the way, Van Wilder and a campus newspaper reporter, Gwen (Tara Reid) meet up, and well... I won't spoil it for you.

Like most teen comedies, the gross out humor is taken to the extreme in Van Wilder. Humping an apple pie seems PG in comparison with eating dog semen (by mistake of course), bare breasts, defecation jokes, masturbation jokes, oral sex, regular sex (both major positions), huge dog testicles, a penis enlarger, and of course projectile vomiting, all of which Van Wilder features.

Although the stereotypical accent and behaviors are bit tasteless (but then again so is most of the film), Taj, the sexually obsessed, "pink taco salad loving" character is seriously hilarious. If you're ever looking for a synonym for oral sex, Taj provides dozens. This character deserves his own movie!

It's interesting that Van Wilder's character was so likable and even caring, rather than simply a boozing Neanderthal. Whether its helping to raise monies for the swim team, offering advice to his fellow students, or even preventing another student from committing suicide ("Timmy" a.k.a.: "The Shermenator" from American Pie), Van Wilder seems to genuinely care for his fellow classmates at Coolidge. The movie appears to actually have a message behind all the Rated R humor about living life to its fullest in the present, while at the same time not fearing the future. Pretty deep, huh?

Like National Lampoon's Animal House, it seems possible that the college in the film is modeled after UMass. For one, there is a reference to inviting "the girls from Mount Holyoke" to a party. The name of the school in the film is "Coolidge College," while we have a Coolidge Tower. Although it was most likely a coincidence, the college in the film is also having its female swim team cut. By process of deduction the school must be UMass, mostly because of the Mount Holyoke reference, since obviously the other coed schools in this area, Amherst College and Hampshire College, don't know how to party. Plus, the school in the film has a popular and respected campus newspaper, just like UMass!

Van Wilder certainly has plenty of funny moments. However, the moments don't really come together to make for a particularly memorable film. Most of the jokes are amped up versions of precious jokes, with little originality. In the film's defense, the teen movie genre has gotten to the point where almost all types of gross out humor have been done, i.e.: all possible bodily fluids have been used in jokes, so it is challenging to make a film like this with much originality.

Arranged marriages musical style.

MONSOON WEDDING
Directed by Mira Nair
Starring Vasundhara Das and Naseeruddin Shah
Playing at Academy of Music, Northampton

Mira Nair's Monsoon Wedding is a big, messy, sprawling and utterly intoxicating ensemble comedy drama that resembles Father of The Bride as directed by a Robert Altman drunk on Indian culture. It's a dazzling and ebullient masterpiece of sheer, joyous wonder about a family on the collective verge of a nervous breakdown in the days prior to its only daughter's arranged marriage. Nair loves to play matchmaker... and loves to celebrate and... loves to make us feel and dream and smile. People often find movies they like, and sometimes even love. Monsoon Wedding is that rare breed of movie, the kind that can actively make you fall in love with it to the point that you want to see it again and again.

Like in an Altman film, Nair drops you into the middle of the action and trusts that the audience is smart enough to sort things out on its own. The action swirls around the Vermas, a Punjabi family in India that is preparing for the wedding of its striking daughter Aditi (Vasundhara Das). The patriarch, Lalit (Naseeruddin Shah), is a good-hearted but endlessly frustrated man trying to deal with the complications that arise when throwing a traditional wedding. He tries to do right, but he's often more absorbed with worrying about money, barking orders into a cell phone, and berating his two sons, one a college student in Australia named Rahul (Randeep Hooda) who broke his hand, as well as a younger son as spectacularly sullen as any American TV kid. The wedding is in two days, and the groom, a handsome programmer from Houston named Hemant (Parvin Dabas) is coming to meet his wife for the first time that afternoon. Aditi, meanwhile, is trying to slip away to spend time with her married lover, the slick host of a TV talk show (in an early funny gag, he has on a guest that dubs a porno film on camera).

It's hard to figure out who's who and what the story is, especially as more and more family show up. But it's even harder to not allow yourself to be seduced by the exuberant spirit of it all. The characters chatter, goad, argue, celebrate and communicate with the joyful energy of life. Declan Quinn's gorgeous camera roves among the overlapping conversations and interlocking subplots, picking up moments of intimacy and real human connection between the characters.

The characters speak in a hurried blend of English, Punjabi and Hindi and the effect is delightful, with the characters whipsawing between tradition and modernization, a theme that may be Nair's most important. (The wedding is nothing if not an old world ritual connecting past to present.)

Some of the subplots feel a bit diagrammed on paper, but Nair gives us the feeling that we are indeed watching life unfold. Nair loves to pair up her couples. There's the central story of Aditi and Hemant, who try to get know each other in their little time together before the wedding. We are reminded of the chaste system of arranged marriages, but the way Nair shows it, the storyline is rather sweet, like an Indian "Dharma and Greg."

Das, with her expressive, beautiful aqua eyes, perfectly plays the awkward struggle of her character, who is partly marrying this stranger because she's fed up with her married lover's vague assurances of divorce. (Dabas is a bit colorless.) There are engaging romantic subplots involving the lonely, marigold munching wedding planner (Vijay Raaz) who has fallen for the family's quiet, pretty, and kind-hearted maid Alice (Tilotama Shome), and the older son's flirtation with Ayesha (Neha Dubey), the beautiful daughter of a family friend. There's also a notorious one with Ria (Shefali Shetty), Aditi's live-in cousin, who was sexually abused by a shark-like older relative as a child and suspects that man is going after another girl.

Nair touches us with graceful moments such as when a tearful Lalit cries in the arms of his wife, or when he stands up to the affluent relative to protect the niece he treats as a daughter. But Nair wants us to enjoy life even more. The Indian film industry, nicknamed Bollywood (Altman drunk on Indian culture. It's a dazzling and ebullient masterpiece of sheer, joyous wonder about a family on the collective verge of a nervous breakdown in the days prior to its only daughter's arranged marriage. Some people learn their alphabet from "Sesame Street." Some people have parents who actually love them and teach them the alphabet instead of leaving them to watch TV and stick their fingers in the electrical sockets. And still others learn their letters through the fashion alphabet. So grab your little brother or sister, tuck them in, and teach them the alphabet the stylish way.

A is for anorexia. Thanks to fashionistas, our nation's young women are starving themselves to be an impossible ide.... [EDITORS NOTE: Columnist fainted from hunger in the middle of this thought.]

B is for berets. Nothin' says I'm a sassy French man (or I wish I were a sassy French man) like sporting a sweet, sweet beret around campus. Tres Euro. Pass the French fries. [EDITORS NOTE: No seriously, guys. Someone really pass the French fries before she passes out again.]

C is for couture. Who wouldn't pay $135,000.00 for a dress made from trash bags, Chinese silk and twine? It's hip, it's edgy – it makes no sense.

D is for Dungeons and Dragons trench coats. Tough, grueling activities like boffing and playing Magic require a lot of arm movement and lots of pocket space. The trench coat has all that you need... and more. It has a charisma level of 8.

F is for Emporio Armani, whose look for this spring is "every-zing black." But then again, when is it not?

F is for flannel. Be it plaid, or... oh wait, does flannel come in any other pattern? Okay, so it's plaid. And nothing says "I am manly so fear me" like eating a big bucket of chicken and wiping your greasy man hands on your absorbent shirt. The darker the plaid, the less you have to wash it – doesn't show grease stains.

G is for Greek Gear. The look is rugby shirts with big Greek Letters (DIK) across the chest for during the week, and a wife-beater with a lampshade on your head for the weekend. HOT.

H is for Hoochie Mama. Conveniently following the frat boys, due to our society's misogynistic belief that the man leads the woman, Hoochie Mama style requires tight pants, a tiny top, a pierced belly button and long hair by which the Hoochie Mama can be dragged to the nearest cave.

I is for ink. That's what we edgy people call tattoos.

J is for jewelry. Also known as ice and bling. Also known as the latest buy-off from daddy for not telling mumsy that he's having an affair with his twenty-year-old secretary, Kiki.

K is for Kathie Lee Gifford and the like, who bring you quality K-Mart fashions at only a fraction of the cost, thanks to starving children in countries decimated by our capitalistic greed.

L is for lace. It is just SO hot this season.

M is for Milan. One of the world's fashion capitals. Yeah, that's in Italy. Hey Supermodels, Italy is that country that looks like a Manolo Blahnik stiletto boot. Yeah, now you've got it.

N is for nail art. Friends don't let friends have five-inch nails with little bits of dollar bills decoupaged on with glittery polish. Super long nails are all fun and games until someone loses an eye.

For more of the fashion alphabet, stay tuned for next week's Style File, 'cause I'm feeling those hunger pains again.

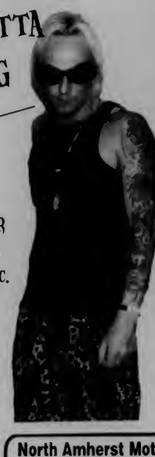
may have been born with blond hair that has since darkened or perhaps he exhibits blond characteristics according to my wise and sassy telepathic pal.



Moreover, I also would never refuse to date someone due to incompatibility of horoscope signs. My sign is so tricky as it is since I was born on the cusp between Taurus and Gemini. Cosmo swears that I am a twin while Glamour and Elle call me bull-headed. In general, I consider myself a Taurus or Earth sign but that does not mean that I will only go for Capricorn cuties (I'm pretty sure they are supposed to be my ideal match). I knew a girl in high school that had my exact birthday separated by an hour or two at birth and we were as different as night and day. The guys she dated did not appeal to me what so ever as most people would never peg us possessing the same sign let alone the same birthday and year!

Yet, I do believe that some people (especially this cool chica I have been mentioning) have a real gift and can perceive aspects of reality to which others are blind. At the same time, a lot of gimmicks are out there like Miss Cleo, causing skepticism among the general public. Basically, just enjoy the insights that tarot cards and horoscopes can give you, as opposed to living your life by them. Trust me – you are in no way doomed because some horoscope in the National Enquirer told you that financial troubles are looming.

However, do not disregard advice trusting everything to clear cut facts and science. There's more to life than cold, hard facts as I feel we have a little bit of witch in all of us. So take the bad with the good and do not get too worked up about a poor reading. The mind is a powerful thing and if you believe in something, it will often come true. So think positively and make sure to browse through both the scientific and supernatural sections of the bookstore taking from each one equally and critically! Minutewomen caught in Spiders' web

By Glen Straub
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There is a weary cliché in sports that says "it doesn't matter how you start the game, it only matters how you finish it."

For the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, this philosophy has not been holding true. The Minutewomen have had a nagging problem all year. Sub-par play at the start of games has led to disappointing performances no matter how spectacular they play in the concluding moments of the contest.

Richmond	10
UMass	8

The reoccurring deficiency was clearly made apparent on Sunday when the Minutewomen faced off with Atlantic 10 Conference tycoon, Richmond, in the unfriendly confines of the Spiders' President Field. In a tightly played affair, the Spiders narrowly defeated the Maroon and White, 10-8.

With their second consecutive defeat, the Minutewomen now have fallen to 6-4 overall. The loss to Richmond was their first in conference play – giving it a 3-1 mark in the A-10.

"We have been real inconsistent of late," junior Lydia Robinson said. "When the individuals are playing inconsistently, the team is inconsistent."

The reason for UMass' woes of late has been its lack of execution in the early moments of the game.

"We didn't come out very strong and we showed some very poor play in the first half," Robinson said. "It really hurt us later on."

Nearly 52 seconds into the game, Richmond attack Kristy Gallagher scored on a free-position, giving the Spiders the first score of the contest.

The first Spider goal put the Minutewomen back onto their heels as Richmond scored another three goals early in the first half – making the score 4-0.

A four-goal deficit is a difficult one to climb out of, but as seen in the Duquesne game, the Minutewomen have all the ability to accomplish the difficult feat.

UMass' leading goal scorer, sophomore Hope Zelinger, came to the rescue once again as she cut the lead to 4-2 at the 12-minute mark of the first half – putting UMass back in the game.

But before UMass even had a chance to realize that it was still in a very important game against a strong A-10 opponent, Richmond produced another four-goal run right before halftime. And at the break, the Minuetwomen were down 8-2.

Head coach Phil Barnes has been in that situation all year long and like usual he made sure his squad kept his composure and it paid off. The Minutewomen galvanized a run of their own as they scored six straight goals to tie the score at 8-8 with 12 minutes to go in the game.

An unlikely goal scorer, junior defender Bridget Byrne, knotted the game at 8-8 when she drove the crease and fired a shot past the Richmond goaltender. It was Byrne's first goal of the season and second of her three-year career.

The UMass run, however, did not shake the Spiders off their web as they scored the last two goals of the en route to a 10-8 victory.

The Minutewomen's stellar second half run proved to be not enough to overcome the poor play of the first half.

"We have been trying to figure out why we cannot play a complete game," Robinson said. "We need to start the game with some fire and hopefully we will be able to play a complete next time out."

The next time out for the Minutewomen will be this Friday when begin a little road trip when they face off with A-10 rival St. Joseph's in the City of Brotherly Love.

"All of us need to be pretty intense in practice the next couple of days," Robinson said. "We need to be focused."

One sports cliche has failed the girls who sport the Maroon and White; possibly another one will lead to their success. Robinson, last week's A-10 Player of the Week winner, briefly said for the St. Joe's game, "we need to work on the little things."

Do you remember the last time the Mullins Center looked like this?

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's Lacrosse

The ECAC named Massachusetts freshman attackman Craig Conn its Lacrosse Rookie of the Week following UMass' victory over UMBC this past Saturday.

Conn won a season-high 17-of-23 faceoffs and scored a goal as the Minutemen defeated UMBC, 18-7. His domination in the faceoff circle allowed the Minutemen to control possession throughout the game. Conn improved his season totals to 54 wins in 102 faceoffs (.529), and three goals and six assists through nine games.

This is the second time this season Conn has been named ECAC Lacrosse Rookie of the Week. He also earned the honor on March 25, following a pair of Massachusetts victories over Albany and Hartford.

Massachusetts is 8-1 overall and 3-0 in the ECAC this season. The Minutemen are currently ranked No. 8 in the latest national poll and have won eight straight games since dropping the season-opener in overtime to Hofstra. Massachusetts returns to action with a road game against New England rival Yale on Saturday at 1:00 p.m.

Crew

The University of Massachusetts women's varsity 8 boat finished second to 17th-ranked Duke in the finals of the California Cup, here today at the prestigious San Diego Crew Classic.

UMass recorded a time of 6:49.87, just behind Duke's first-place clocking (6:43.40) and just ahead of Southern Methodist (6:51.56) and Kansas State (6:52.65). Duke had recorded the fastest time (6:51.80) in yesterday's first round, while UMass had turned in the third-fastest mark at 6:58.37, but both teams improved on those marks in today's final.

"My team surprised me again today, they really figured it out," UMass coach Jim Dietz said. "This is a good indication of our speed, and a very good start for us."

Women's water polo

The Massachusetts women's water polo team went 1-2 in three conference games this weekend. The Minutewomen trounced Connecticut College, 15-1, and fell to Harvard, 6-5 and No. 17 Brown, 8-6.

UMass will next compete in the ECAC Championship, April 13-14, in Cambridge, Mass.

Softball standing strong in A-10

Minutewomen are winners of 11 straight

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the Massachusetts softball team, good things come in threes.

The Minutewomen swept a three-game series from Saint Joseph's this weekend, led by stellar pitching from junior Kaila Holtz and big offensive production from senior Scooter Wheeler, who broke the UMass career record for runs batted in.

The previous record holder was Kim Guttridge, who played for UMass from 1985 to 1988.

"To make me think, [Wheeler] broke Kim's record, and Kim was a great hitter," said coach Elaine Sortino, of the achievement. "Hopefully, Scooter is just setting the bar for someone down the road."

Of course, the Minutewomen won't have too much time to savor the victory with a doubleheader this afternoon against the Catamounts of Vermont.

The Catamounts come into Amherst riding their first win of the season... a 9-5 victory over Quinnipiac.

UMass, meanwhile, is sitting atop the Atlantic 10 standings with a 9-0 conference record (26-10 overall).

The Maroon and White is riding high after beating up on the Hawks over the weekend. In Saturday's doubleheader, Holtz and senior Jen Hadley each performed impressively on the mound, with Holtz winning the first game 7-1, and Hadley ending the day with a 4-1 victory. Holtz struck out four and yielded four hits in the opener, and Hadley dominated the late show, with two strikeouts and four hits.

Wheeler's third inning home run would be all the scoring UMass needed in the first game. The round-tripper, her fourth of the season, moved Wheeler into a tie with Missy Rhoades for second place on the Atlantic 10 homerun leaderboard.

On Sunday, the offense took the stage, with a seven-run third inning led off by aggressive baserunning by sophomore Jaimie Cahalan. The Minutewomen then used six hits and a St. Joseph's error to plate seven.

In the fifth inning, freshman Pam Sullek knocked a pinch hit single to left field for the first hit of her college career.

"Pam's a great kid, and a great player," Sortino said. "She's going to be a great hitter, and she's doing the right things to develop."

Sortino also stressed the importance of Wheeler's influence on the backup third baseman. "To watch Scooter, Pam is really learning things."

For the second time in four days, the Minutewomen were up against more than one foe, as temperatures dipped and snow fell on the field in Philadelphia.

"I thought the girls showed a lot of heart," Sortino said. "It was difficult for anyone to do anything. That's about as hard a game to play as I've ever seen. But the kids stuck with it."

UMass now looks ahead to this afternoon's matchups with Vermont, with the hopes of extending its home winning streak, currently sitting at 35 victories. The Minutewomen's last loss at the Softball Complex came nearly two years ago, on April 30, 2000.

Minutewomen can also be found all over the A-10 leaderboards. Senior Teri Rooney leads the conference in hits (34), triples (four), and total bases (46). Rooney also sits fourth in RBIs with 18. Holtz and Hadley are three and four in strikeouts, with 68 and 60, respectively.

Holtz and Hadley are two-thirds of a pitching trio that has been the backbone for the Minutewomen throughout the season.

When asked about the importance of Holtz, Hadley, and freshman Kelli Arnold as a pitching team, Sortino said, "We're very fortunate to have those three pitchers, it's a very formidable pitching staff. Pitching is just the name of the game."

However, don't expect Sortino, or her troops, to know about their accomplishments in the league.

"We never look at stat sheets. There's just so much to be put into the season," she said. "If we don't win the conference tournament, and the NCAA tournament, who cares?"

What the Maroon and White will be looking at is improvement in its game when it takes on the Catamounts.

"We need to do some things better," Sortino said. "And we have a whole agenda. We have a specific pitching agenda. Our thinking is not about Vermont, but about UMass."

JOE HARO/ READER'S COLLEGIAN

The UMass softball team has won 11 games in a row, nine in the Atlantic 10.

Matt Brady's All-Time Team

Cobb's off-the-field antics outweighed by on-field domination

This is part one of a 10-part series portraying the 10 members of "Brady's All-Time Team" – a lineup consisting of the best Major League Baseball players ever.

Ty Cobb was widely known as the meanest S.O.B. you could ever meet. Well documented are the incidents ever linked to his name. Ty Cobb may have had the worst temper in the history of mankind.

But what you may not know is that Cobb was a victim of mental illness in an era when treatment of such illness was hardly talked about, and was rarely successful. And his reputation for recklessness may be the main reason why he is not generally regarded as the best all-around baseball player since the creation of the game.

Credentials (all time rank): .366 career batting average (1); 892 stolen bases (4); 2246 runs (2); 724 doubles (4); 295 triples (2); only man ever to lead league in home runs and steals, 1909; 23 consecutive .300-plus seasons; 12 batting titles; stole home a record 35 times.

The Argument: Ted Williams likely was the best hitter that ever lived. I would argue. But aside from presence, a hitter was all Williams was on the field. He couldn't run the bases, was a lackadaisical figure in the shadow of the great left field wall, and though he could throw adequately, he was never a threat to gun runners down.

Barry Bonds is certainly gunning for a position on this team, and stellar defense and great baserunning make him a candidate. Still, his power numbers are inflated by his generation and his .292 average isn't enough to make the squad, despite his awesome .419 on base percentage.

Rickey Henderson is a poor man's Cobb, plain and simple, with a batting average 86 points less.

What you didn't know: An 18-year-old tearing it up in the minor leagues was destined for stardom with the Detroit Tigers in 1905. Eleven days before he would make his major league debut, however, he received a shock that even the strongest of men would have difficulty handling – his father, the man who he respected more than anyone else in the world, was dead.

But it is the details of his death that affected Cobb so much throughout the rest of his life. Cobb's father, an extremely jealous husband, thought his wife Amanda was cheating on him. William Cobb pretended to leave town, then tried to sneak in through the bedroom window to catch his wife in bed with her lover. Amanda, allegedly thinking he was a burglar, unloaded two rounds of a heavy-gauge shotgun into her husband's head at close range.

Cobb's hatred is widely reported, but from many accounts, he could be a quite amiable friend. Walter Johnson, one of the nicest men to ever play baseball, held Cobb as a hunting companion and close friend for years, calling him a misunderstood person, (incidentally, on the field, the friendship subsided, as Cobb used Johnson's fear of hitting a batter to get easy hits off the big Kansan.)

The only argument against Cobb as a member of the All-Time Team is the fact that he hit only 118 career longballs. However, this was not so much a lack of power as it was a dislike for the brand of baseball that Babe Ruth ushered in. Cobb lived and died by the game of small ball perfected by John McGraw around the turn of the century.

When the lively ball was introduced in the 1920s, Cobb became insanely jealous of the fan base that Ruth was garnering, and that people were beginning to praise Ruth as the best player in the game. Cobb, in 1925, had had enough of the talk. And so, on May 5, fresh off a bout with influenza, Cobb declared his intention to give a clinic in home run hitting. All he did was go 6-for-6 with three homers, a double and two singles. The next day, he added two more homers and a single. Cobb then returned to his normal self, and finished 1925 with just 12 circuits.

Tyrus Raymond Cobb was a vicious man with an unequalled temper who quite simply was the toughest man to play Major League Baseball. He was also a man whose numbers are second to none, and who played in pain for almost all of his career. Had it not been for his personality, he would likely be regarded as the greatest baseball player of all-time. That more than qualifies him to leadoff and play left field for my team.

Odyssey honoring the lost

Alumni association makes trek to ground zero

ALL PHOTOS: SCOTT ELDREDGE/ COLLEGIAN

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Alumni Association paid its respects last Friday to the 11 alumni that perished on Sept. 11. Two other students and I made the trip with them. Sobering does not begin to describe the experience.

It was my first trip to New York City, and while totally lost geographically, I knew it as soon as we rolled up to the site. It didn't take me long to figure it out that we were there – the huge hole in the skyline created by the destruction of seven colossal buildings made it easy to figure out.

I think everyone realized it at the same time. All of the chatter in the police escort van abruptly stopped. The huge emptiness in the air where the World Trade Center should have stood haunted everyone standing within reach of where its shadows were cast. Never in my life had clear, open blue sky seemed so scary.

The van came to a stop, and we started to get out. A New York state trooper security agent mysteriously known to us only as Reggie helped me get the wreath out of the van. The wreath is the reason I was there. Eleven University of Massachusetts alumni died in the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11.

Eleven individuals, 11 different stories and one act of hate all led me to a spot on a freshly paved city street less than 200 feet from an open cavern – a cavern that seven short months before had gone in one instant from being a center of financial, tourist and national pride to a twisted horror scene buried in 10 stories of iron, concrete, steel and death.

Meeting the Man

How do we try and prevent this from happening again? Every American knows that precautions are being taken to prevent terrorists from taking another such terrorist action on us again. But what are these measures? What is being done to make the United States of America a safe place to live and grow?

As part of the trip, we were invited to the Office of Public Security for New York State. The office, created in the post-Sept. 11 world by New York Governor George E. Pataki, is essentially the homeland security office for the state of New York. Heading this office is Jim Kallstrom, the former assistant director of the FBI and head of the FBI in New York City. The lead investigator in the TWA Flight 800 Crash and the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, Kallstrom also has one other credential of interest to his name: University of Massachusetts graduate, class of 1966.

Picking Up the Pieces

"The globe has really shrunk," Kallstrom said as he sipped from his coffee mug. "The United States really has an international economy that outgrew an aspect of security."

He looked down the table from his head seat position as he talked to his visitors from UMass. "If you've flown, you basically know that there is no security in airports. It was inevitable that this would happen, and it's inevitable that something else is going to happen again." At this, Kallstrom's eyes narrowed and his voice dropped a little.

"The rest of the world has security," he nodded. "But we're this lousy-guess people that don't want to impose anything on people. When you have people living here fostering their glee with what happened to all those people [in the Trade Center], it's a tough situation."

So what do we do to stop it?

"The number one priority of the government is to protect the citizens," Kallstrom explained to us. "You can split the things our government is planning to do into two columns."

Kallstrom's voice deepened. "In one column, we're doing our best at stopping another [attack] even from happening through intelligence..." His voice faded away, as he went back into thought.

"It's kind of like having a house and taking the doors off," he said. "I really don't think that's an overdramatization. I think it makes sense to do common sense things, because we haven't; we have to do big things."

His face darkened and he raised his voice. "We knew about an approaching security problem in 1988 as analog technology went to digital... We knew [intelligence-wise] we wouldn't be able to keep up... We didn't do much of anything until after 9-11. That's 14 years." He drew out the word 14, adding emphasis to his point.

Kallstrom then remembered his second "column," the other thing the government has to prepare for since the Sept. 11 debacle. "We've got to clean it up if and when [terrorist action] happen."

He pushed himself away from the table a little. All present could sense that he was switching gears as he thought again. "I'm an optimist," he said. "I'd like to think that we can do away with the root cause of this problem. If we can't, we're going to have to follow this situation through, though."

Kallstrom outlined things that the state of New York is more closely trying to protect now – everything from the milk supply to small airfields to the water supply.

"They're thinking outside the box. Yes, we're covering the New York Stock Exchange," he said, giving an example of an obvious target. "But there's 545 airports in the state of New York. Try watching them all."

Kallstrom took a deep breath, reviewing in his head all that he'd said to us in the previous hour. "All this stuff I've been talking about? We've been talking about it for decades," he noted. "We don't do things until there are big problems in the United States."

Kallstrom shook his head. "A lot of people," he began slowly, "say that during the Clinton Administration, the [American] people wouldn't have stood for [doing] something [aggressive to prevent terrorism]. Of course not. Leadership needs to stand up for it and keep the public's attention that this is serious.

"We can't do everything at once," Kallstrom demanded.

He exhaled. "We CAN do one thing at a time, and eventually, we'll be better off. I think this is more serious than the Cold War... than World War II... this is a lot to deal with."

Hairdrive unlocks hope

By Jennifer Eastwood
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One hundred seventeen braids of hair were collected yesterday during the 12 hour-long, student-sponsored hair drive at the Robert Crown Center of Hampshire College.

Hair stylists from the studios Hair East in Amherst, Hair Fix in Auburn and Lulu's Hair & Tanning Salon and Mane Tamers, both of Northampton, donated their time in order to cut and style hair at the Center for the day. The hair donations will now be sent to the Locks of Love foundation and used to make hairpieces for children who have lost their hair due to alopecia, a hair loss condition, or chemotherapy treatment.

"I've since the first hair dresser walked in, there has just been this spirit about the room," said event co-organizer Bonnie Obremski, a first year student at Hampshire College concentrating in journalism. "This has brought all people in the Five College Area, both students and the community, together."

"This is amazing," agreed Shira Granote, the hair drive's other co-organizer and a first year Hampshire College pre-med student.

"I didn't think we'd have this many," confessed Obremski, "People came in all day up until the last minute."

Indeed, many who attended the drive considered the turnout impressive. Dinita Nikonezyk, a volunteer hair stylist from Lulu's, reported that she saw a constant stream of people during her time at the Crown Center and remarked that she too was surprised with the amount of people.

"It's been really a handful," Kathy Rogers, a hair stylist from Mane Tamers concurred. "Once we cut it off, we style their hair, and people have been pretty good in letting us do what we want."

What brought all of these people to the Crown Center though? Responses from some of those donating their hair indicated that many sincerely wanted to be of help to others.

"I thought about doing it a few years ago," a Northampton resident identified as Rosie said. "I know of children who had the [alopecia] disease. I haven't had short hair in 20 years, but it seems worth it."

Denise Conti, an employee of the Hampshire College Outdoors program, did not have her hair cut at the Crown Center. Instead, the hair she donated had been saved over the years waiting for the right cause to surface.

"I had my ringlets from 1950 that my mother cut off," Conti said, "I had my hair that was cut off in 1955 and my pony tail from 1959. The only reason I kept them was my mother sent it from England (where I was brought up), and I didn't know what to do with it until I heard of this."

Conti donated each of the three ponytails much to the surprise and delight of Obremski and Granote.

Likewise, Sinoun Kim, a University of Massachusetts senior education major, brought her ponytail of pre-hair to the Crown Center. Kim recalled watching the television program Oprah a month ago, seeing a piece about the organization Locks of Love and wanting to help out. Upon getting in touch with the organization, she found out about yesterday's hair drive.

"I know it's really expensive to make wigs out of real hair," Kim said. "I actually cut my hair for that reason."

For others, relinquishing hair was an emotional deal in itself.

"We've only had one guy cut his hair," Granote said. "He had really long hair and went to a nice guy's haircut, but he was a little shaken up."

"I think he was the most traumatized of the day," Obremski added. "I think he felt like it was a part of his identity. I mean, he was Jesus for Hampshire Halloween."

While the sentiment of helping others ran rampant at the hair drive, one wondered whom the hair was helping. While Locks of Love hairpieces are sold or donated (depending on one's financial situation) to cancer patient children who lost their hair during chemotherapy treatment, the organization focuses on those with alopecia.

Seth Raphael, a second year Hampshire College student concentrating in culture and technology, began losing his hair due to alopecia approximately 14 years ago. Previous to that, Raphael had long, blond hair.

Although the cause of alopecia is unknown, the three popular theories for it relate to stress, genetics and one's environment. No one in Raphael's family has the condition, thus he is led to believe it deals with stress, at least in his case.

Raphael began losing hair on his legs, followed by his eyebrows and eventually the top of his head – a phenomenon which dermatologists told him is rare. In

In Memory

I walked across the freshly paved street with the wreath in my arms. A cold, bitter wind pushed down between the remaining high rises, and I shivered. It may have been April, but the weather suggested February last Friday.

Susan Mattei, Executive Director of the UMass Alumni Association, led us towards the platform where World Trade Center victim's families could view the site and mourn their losses. Built up against the nearby World Financial Center and Dow Jones Building, it overlooks the canyon that remains of the World Trade Center site, a clear sign of the steady progress that New Yorkers have made in cleaning up the site as quickly and respectfully as possible.

The seven UMass people in attendance – four alumni, three students – slowly worked their way up the wooden staircase. A quote by Abraham Lincoln served as a centerpiece on the lower level of the platform.

"I pray that our heavenly father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom," it reads. It's from his "Letter to Mrs. Bixby," the mother of a civil war soldier that perished in battle.

Overwhelmed already, we made our way to the higher level. We placed the wreath on a stand up against a wooden support pole, and Mattei read a poem out loud. We then reached the names of those from our UMass family that were lost in the attack.

"The University of Massachusetts Amherst Alumni Association was deeply affected by the tragic events of Sept. 11. We would like to express our deep sympathy for all of our UMass family members who were affected," Mattei read to us and anyone else listening.

We started to read the names off, one by one. After each name was read, the folder with UMass letterhead inside emblazoned with the names of the victims got passed on to the next member of our travel group. My mind drifted as the names were read. "Christoffer M. Carstanjen… Geoffrey W. Cloud… Tara Shea Creamer… Peter Hashem… Todd Russell Hill… John C. Jenkins… Thomas N. Pecorelli… David Ellis Rivers… Sheryl L. Rosner Rosenbaum…"

At this, the letterhead was sitting in my hands. "Jessica Sachs," I said in a clear voice. My voice caught, though, as I saw the Sachs was a member of the Class of 2001. I later confirmed that she indeed graduated last spring. Graduated in spring. Died in the fall. She was 22 years old.

The last person in our group named one other victim the Association had chosen to recognize: Peter J. Ganci, chief of the New York City Fire Department. His daughter Danielle is a member of the UMass Class of 2000.

With that, we were allowed to wander the site. My mind wandered just as much. I thought of the car trip from the Security Office building to ground zero. In the course of several dozen city blocks, I had got Trooper Reggie (I regretfully have no other information on him) to open up on his role during Sept. 11.

"It was like walking into a disaster movie," he told me. Originally told to deal with the fleeing crowds as they came over the Brooklyn Bridge, Reggie was reassigned to ground zero before Sept. 11 was over.

"I was a member of the 'bucket brigade'," he said. His face betrayed no emotion, as he spoke the words, but his eyes told a different story. "I sifted through the piles looking for body parts. You'd step in something gooey and realize it could be human flesh. You didn't know what you were walking in."

I recalled Reggie's face as he revealed to us that he had a close friend that worked on the 86th floor. "We haven't seen her since," he said quietly.

The sound of iron clanging as workers labored in the Trade Center hole jarred me back to reality. I began to survey the whole scene. I knew from briefing that seven buildings had been demolished in the disaster and that eight others had sustained heavy damage.

I looked at these other eight buildings. A black shroud ran down the length of the side of one of the high-rise buildings, well over 50 stories long. A gigantic American flag hung defiantly on top of it. The sides of all the other surrounding buildings were caked with soot, ash and scorched from the heat of the fires that ravaged the Trade Center. Many windows were missing, even seven months later. Several of the buildings had constructions crews working on them, steadily trying to fix what had been destroyed.

My attention turned to the memorial itself. I gazed blurrily at a wall of faces, pictures and letters filled with the agony of uncertainty that many of the families have. It occurred to me that for many of the victims, this is as close to a gravesite as they will ever get. I realized the difficulty families involved must have in finding true closure.

My eyes fixed on individual letters, and my heart sunk. Each letter, while all nearly the same, told the story of another individual that was a victim of circumstance; thousands of individuals, thousands of different stories, one act of hate.

I began to read the lines of "A Fireman's Prayer," but tore my attention away from it before I finished. When I can called to duty. God, whenever flames may rage," it began. "Give me strength to save some life, whatever be its age."

With a sick feeling in my stomach, my gaze continued to shift. My eyes met the gaze of Vladamir Savenkin, as I stared at a poster with his face on it. "5/9/80 – 9/11/01," it read underneath his photo. I quickly did the math and realized that Vladamir was 21 when he died. It dawned on me that he easily could have been one of us. He was our age, our generation. Gone, just like the rest of them.

I continued my wandering. My eyes took in the gifts, flowers and card that mourners had left as they slowly built a shrine out of the site. Some gifts seemed normal. Others seemed a little strange. One man left his brother a full bottle of Heineken. A woman left her son a Ziploc bag with two packages of Reese's peanut butter cups in it.

Finally I stopped, perhaps finding what I was looking for. In a childish crayon-drawn scrawl, I read the following: "Dear Tommy Cahill, I miss you a lot! I wish you could come back I love you so much!!! I wish you could come back and swim in the pool. You were so fun to play with!!! You were a grate uncle. I used to have four uncles but now I have three uncles with one in heaven. …from Ashley." A heart was drawn in purple after the word heaven.

My heart broke. My heart will break again every time I think of that letter. As I came back to reality, I realized several men in kilts with bagpipes were playing "Amazing Grace." I had not even seen them come in. The steady whir of the cement mixer pouring a new sidewalk hummed in the background of the bagpipe music. The wind came up again, and I shivered. Two tears dropped from my left eye. Perhaps the wind blowing the dust into my face had caused them; but I don't think that was it.

■ hair drive

JAMES SCHAPPER/COLLEGIAN

One hundred and seventeen locks of hair, used as hair pieces for kids with hair loss, were collected yesterday.

most cases, he explained, hair loss begins on the head and spreads to the limbs.

Raphael continued losing his hair till people began asking him if he was a monk, for he had the typical bald center with hair on the sides, prompting his decision to shave his head completely.

The way in which he dealt with his hair loss was to keep a journal recording what his friends said upon seeing his shaved head. Reactions ranged from, "You shaved yourself," to "You missed a spot," to "You're the Michael Jordan of Shephardstown [his hometown]," he reminisced.

But his worried father, he added, was a different story.

"He kept asking if I wanted to see someone, a physiologist or someone," said Raphael.

And indeed Raphael did try three alternative forms of medication, ranging from acupuncture to medicinal steroids shots in his scalp. From discomfort, he never stayed with any of the treatments long and only saw some working results with regrowth of hair in his eyebrows.

"I never even thought about getting a wig," Raphael explained. "A wig would never really do what my real hair did. I felt it was fine me being bald, so I struggled with working with Locks of Love."

He found himself faced with the question, "Why should [others with the condition] get a wig?" when he did not.

"Then I realized I was a special case," he pointed out, "especially for girls, because it is less socially acceptable [for them] to be bald, so I decided it was a good thing."

Raphael, who aided Ohrenski and Granote in organizing the hair drive, admitted however that even he began to miss his own hair much more lately due to the drive and found himself wishing for it once again.

Author Bard speaks on conflict in Middle East; criticizes Palestinians

By Jake Lilien
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Mitchell Bard, Executive Director of the American-Israeli Cooperative Enterprise, spoke in the Campus Center Monday night about the Arab-Israeli conflict. In his lecture, Bard delivered a condemnation of Yasir Arafat, and the tactics of his Palestinian followers.

"It is morally outrageous to compare terrorists and anti-terrorists," he said. "I don't care what Israel does, there's no excuse for blowing up women and children."

Bard's lecture came in the midst of a week filled with activism related to the Arab-Israeli conflict on the University of Massachusetts campus. On Friday, Five College Hillel held a vigil for Israeli terrorism victims, and condemned the actions of Palestinians. Yesterday, a rally against Israel's military actions was held on the steps of the Student Union.

In Bard's lecture, he accused the Palestinian Authority of disrupting the peace process, and rejected the claims that Israel was perpetuating a cycle of violence in the Middle East.

"Israelis, I think, desperately crave peace," he said. "No Israeli wants to live under the circumstances in which they're living."

Bard began his lecture by saying that the Middle Eastern conflict is not one in which both sides of the debate can lay equal claim to the truth.

"This isn't, 'one side is equal to the other,'" he said. "This is, 'one side is outright wrong'."

He attempted to refute the claims of those opposed to the existence of Israel. At one point, he criticized the theory that Zionism is a form of racism.

"Zionism is the belief that the Jewish people are people, like any other, and deserve a homeland," he said. "It can't be racist, because anyone can be a Zionist. I would argue that the most Zionist people I know are black Jews from Ethiopia."

He repeatedly attacked Yasir Arafat, accusing him of spreading lies about Israel and Judaism, and of refusing to rein in Islamic extremists.

"People say that Arafat can't do anything," he said. "But if Arafat wanted to end terrorism, he would treat terrorists as his enemies."

Bard held up a map, which he claimed to have downloaded from the Palestinian Authority's website, which labeled all of modern-day Israel as "Palestine." He argued that it would be impossible to get Arafat to compromise, considering that he openly advocated the destruction of the Israeli nation.

At one point, Bard explained that Israel had fully withdrawn from the nation of Lebanon, as they had promised. One attendee began shouting, "That is a lie! You are a liar!"

At the conclusion of Bard's speech, the attendee again accused him of lying about the withdrawal from Lebanon.

Bard responded by saying, "I'm not saying Israel withdrew from Lebanon, the United Nations is."

This response did not satisfy the attendee, who identified himself to the audience as "Nasser."

"This was a terrible lecture!" he yelled. "I'm so disappointed that I came!"

One student in attendance, Vered Bisker, a PhD candidate in Chemical Engineering, identified herself as an Israeli citizen. Bisker accused President Bush of sending a mixed message.

"He told us to fight terrorism," she said. "Then several days after we started fighting terrorism, we were told, 'Withdraw from the territory.'"

Bard agreed, calling the actions of Bush and Secretary of State Colin Powell "completely hypocritical."

"Powell didn't say that the United States should negotiate with Osama Bin Laden," he added. "He didn't say we were perpetuating a cycle of violence by going after al Qaeda."

Why is it so hard for a 30-year-old to think about retirement? When you're young, retirement planning is pretty far down on your list of concerns. Say, somewhere between the melting polar ice caps and dishpan hands. And that's completely understandable. But by planning early and sticking to that plan, you can increase the money you'll have to enjoy retirement, and potentially decrease the years you'll spend working. We offer a range of different options, including tax-deferred retirement plans, SRAs, and IRAs, all with low expenses. Now that's something to fall in love with.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

COLLEGIANEDITORIAL@YAHOO.COM ED/OP EDITOR: MATTHEW DESPRES

Administration should stop dragging its heels

This week has been marked with protest from resident assistants across campus following the decision by the University to refuse to negotiate with them.

While the labor board of Massachusetts has decided that resident assistants indeed have the right to unionize the University still refuses to sit down with the students and bargain with them. They would rather spend thousands of dollars in a lengthy court battle that will likely only result in the same type of scenario that they are currently facing.

Beyond the fact that the refusal to negotiate with resident assistants is wrong and potentially illegal, the blatant waste of money that such an endeavor would require is entirely irresponsible especially in fiscally trying times.

If the University cannot find a way to keep the Foreign Language Resource Center open, or to maintain an adequate number of both classes and professors for its students then what makes administrators believe that taking on a lengthy court battle is a good idea? And for what reason?

The resident assistants are obviously employees of UMass that are deserving of fair treatment, fair wages and representation in the same way that any other employee on campus deserves those rights.

The process in which the choice for a union came about was entirely fair and democratic. The resident assistants voted for a union because they felt that they needed to be represented. Furthermore they made groundbreaking strides, forming the first legal union for resident assistants in the country. Not only that but they have given hope to other students around the country who are now attempting to set up their own unions at colleges and universities.

The bottom line is that the University is breaking the law in refusing to acknowledge the both the right for undergraduates to unionize and in refusing to uphold the decision of the Massachusetts Labor Board.

The University is wasting time and money and making a mockery of the hard work and effort that is done on a day-to-day basis by resident assistants and of the energy and efforts that went into organizing the undergraduates.

Honestly, the University is facing serious fiscal problems as well as looking for a new chancellor to head up the campus.

Doesn't the administrators at UMass have something better to worry about than waging a lengthy court battle that they will likely lose?

Togetherness comes to an end

SCOTT ELDRIDGE II

RAs UNITE! Pull together and the United Auto Workers will support you. Join up, bond with your fellow workers. UNION YES!

Oh, on a side note, we might not truly represent you.

Represent is a funny word. To me it means that you are standing in place of someone who can not always physically be there, who's own voice gets lost in the bureaucratic shuffle, who's interests lie in your cause, but who's time is filled. RAs are students too. RAs have class and work, and a multitude of other things filling the pages of our Residence Life provided day planners, so we are those souls who need someone who can put in the time to represent us, especially if we are working under the auspices of an all powerful union. The actions of Monday morning are not my cause, however. They are not my fight, and they certainly do not represent me.

Common sense tells me this: If I were to have to miss out on a meeting and needed to send someone in my stead, that individual is there to act as me, represent me, and according to that premise, would not behave in such a manner as to contradict my own initiatives and interests. That 'representative' would also not act, based on the same belief, in such a way as to give my reputation a virtual kick in the pants. By protesting, occupying and acting in the general way that roughly 30 union supporters did on Monday morning, that is exactly what happened.

I find it odd, ridiculous in fact, that the Resident Assistants who are charged with the task of keeping order are now the ones causing such disorder. This really just came to me a short while ago when I had to ask residents in my own building to quiet down because others were having trouble getting their schoolwork done. Throughout the hour or so that the events of Monday morning took place, someone was being denied this right to concentrate and do their work. But irony is far from my main complaint. That can be found in the general disregard for the reputations forcibly created by the boisterous Union supporters.

We are not much more than students trying to finish out a degree in about four years (give or take semesters at the administrative will.) Sure there are those of us, RAs and otherwise, who stand out. Names like Sheehan and Taubinger are going to ring louder bells then Eldridge ever will. Within certain circles other names come to the forefront, but the truth is we are making dimples, not dents. So what we can retain, what we can gain, from whatever actions and events we do go through will effect our reputations. Whether it is the reparter you enjoy with a professor or someone in one of Whitmore's many offices, this is what shape how you are perceived. It's a simple and frequently accepted fact. Everyone who can form an opinion has done so, everyone who can judge, has done so, by every action word and mild association. Perhaps these ramblings will gain me a new reputation, further deepen or possibly fill in my UMass dimple. At this stage in the long (hopefully) game of life we need to hang on to what we've got. I just had something taken away from me.

Were there an award for such an honor as having my name and position thrown around, I think we as RAs might win it. So herein lie my "Thank You's."

Thank you UAW organizer Tim Scott, truly holding strong as my bastion of hope to the administration. Thank you for doing what I would never do and banging on doors, hollering two, four, six, AND eight, and "when do we want it" loud and proud through the halls of my campus. Thank you for spearheading the cause of standing in for 560 people and expressing their personal opinions to the world. In addition I would like to thank the union supporters who found time to get there on Monday and scream out "NEGOTIATE!" and "I WANT A BAGEL!" for me, because that is something I can never repay you for. "I want a bagel, toasted, with chive cream cheese." Now those are some demands I can live with. Thank You, RA union supporters. In addition, I would like to thank those of you who needed a cause, yes you "other folks." I looked around that office, that hallway, those stairwells, and saw some unfamiliar faces. I feel so bad that I don't know your names so I can't thank you personally. But you helped too in this seemingly envious task of taking on my own character as well as that of my fellow Resident Assistants.

At this point you may think, "surely he jests, he must have misheard, who would ask the Vice Chancellor for a bagel when so many reputations are riding on his shoulders." Well, Bagel Guy, you took that heavy burden and said 'to hell with it' as you made such inane requests. I sure am glad that you have considered what it is to protest for all the RAs and made the best of our cause with your desire for food. Oh, and thanks for bringing it up again on your return trip to Whitmore; that showed the true class and attitude I have been looking for. Thanks, in conclusion, to the "return voyage." You were probably right; Javier Cevallos probably didn't hear your bullhorns. He probably totally missed the fact that you were in his boss' office, even when it was Cevallos who asked you to leave. Good thing you came back in the off chance that he forgot the morning disruption.

So here's how I see it playing out. Nothing comes of this. I am not saying that there won't be a union. Hell, a group willing to make a return trip to Whitmore sure shows some tenacity. I'm not even saying that if there is a union there won't be someone who continues in this now rooted tradition of ridiculous action. What I mean by 'nothing' is that my reputation won't be used to wrap the next day's catch. I'm not worried that I won't be treated fairly in class, or in an office on campus simply for being an RA. The fact is that unless I volunteer the information most people will never know my position. But there is the underlying truth to my long diatribe. You as the group, the individuals that compose the group, and all those who will surely join such groups in the future, are shouldering a cause, a united group of Resident Assistants, and accordingly you are representing them, sitting in at that meeting for their causes. Show some tact. It won't be hoots and hollers, it won't be occupied offices and it won't be repeat visits to Whitmore that get things done.

I don't know exactly how much Javier Cevallos, or Marcellette Williams get paid, but I am sure it is more than enough of our money to guarantee that they won't be giving in just because they can't use their conference table for 40 minutes, or because they have to hear your voices through their doors and walls. You aren't going to achieve a heard voice through actual volume. You can't even get a light bulb changed without things being filled out in triplicate. So while you have a right to protest, and should do so by that right, don't use that voice while abandoning civility. Take the cause that you have been entrusted with and use it wisely. Take the names of the united undergraduates and represent them in such a way that the campus will be proud of who they are supporting, not in a manner that even RAs are ashamed to tie themselves to. I am not a representative; I do not stand in place of my brethren. I speak for myself. Were I to have your burden I would be whistling a different tune, and would do so with the support and knowledge of all those whose tune I whistle.

Dear principal
About my attendance...

Dear Principal Williams,

Mr. Richard Burt takes attendance daily. Like any good teacher, he wants to make sure that his stu- class. To show just how to about attendance, he accept homework turned in class by students missing class personally, they have a valid signed by an appropriate

Your sort of get-tough policy is a thing for the University of Massachusetts- High School. Far too students are skipping classes to smoking underneath the bleachers, even necking at Make-out This is the sort of wanton that must be prevented by an vance policy.

However, as progressive as our UMHS attendance policy is, might I make a few more suggestions about ways to ensure a better academic experience?

Too many students interrupt class to go to the bathroom – would a certain number of bathroom passes prevent this flagrant abuse of privilege? Just because a student wants to take a break doesn't mean a twenty minute sojourn to the facilities is in order.

Similarly, too many students loiter in the hallways. Couldn't hall monitors prevent the embarrassing display of lackadaisical behavior by my fellow students? They are always sitting around when they could be in the library studying or volunteering at a local soup kitchen.

Mr. Burt is good for UMHS. His tough policy and no-nonsense enforcement should be the model our other teachers strive to follow. If more could emulate his professionalism, UMHS would surely thrive in this wonderful new century we have entered.

As always, Go Minutemen!

Sammy Wilkinson
Junior Class President

Dear Diary,

I can't wait for college.

Today, I woke up feeling exhausted. I knew that I could not contribute anything in my classes as I was totally tired. I spent all night working on a paper for Mr. Burt. He apparently thinks that I don't have anything better to do with my time, like the homework I have in my other classes.

It's not that I'm complaining – I know college will be worse, homework-wise. I got my work done anyway, so it wasn't any big deal. It's just that I woke up this morning and I just wasn't into class. I could barely keep my eyes open on the bus.

Three weeks ago, the same thing happened. I did all my homework and woke feeling like death. I was going to skip class but knew that he wouldn't grade my homework, so I dragged myself to class. I was barely coherent and I'm not sure that I remember any specifics. At least I turned in my homework. He must have looked at it for almost a minute before signing "good" at the top and giving it back to me.

Anyway, this morning I was totally desperate for coffee, but the bus got to campus just a few minutes before class began. I didn't have time to stop – he won't grade the homework if I'm late – so I trudged to class.

A sign on the door said class was canceled and to wait around for my second period class. The sign also said my homework wasn't due till tomorrow. I know he says he gives back checks and gives us medicine, but that's a total crock. He doesn't do any of that. He just has a totally different set of rules to play by. He was being to me because he knew I was writing a letter to Principal Williams.

The point is, I know this won't happen in college. Professors in college are so cool – if I'm too tired to go to class, I know I won't get treated like a 14 year-old for skipping. If anybody knows that I'm too sick or out of it to go to class, it's me. Right?

Professors have their limits, sure, but they are the decent limits of liberal people. I bet, in college, a professor even lets you turn in a paper a day late and it is still totally cool. Or even if they just take off a few points, they'd never go so far as to ignore the work all together.

Anyway, that's enough for tonight. Oh, except that college is going to totally rule. UMHS blows in ways that any decent college wouldn't.

Totally jacked for learning.

The value of time

ERIC LARSEN

Six dollars and 75 cents a week.

That's how much money I earn writing this column. Each requires three to six hours of work. But I'm not complaining, and I'm not asking for a raise, or a series of erstwhile compliments. I just want to share the financial value of my time with you.

I earn an average of $1.50/hour each week I work at the Collegian; my time is worth little from a financial perspective. But the price of time can be calculated in other ways.

My writing has improved exponentially since I started here three years ago, and I am savvier politically. My resume is stronger: my interpersonal skills have improved, having been required to work with my ideological antitheses and I no longer cower before professional adults.

Whether or not my ideas are the children of a flaccid mind, my columns have energized political discussion on campus. Last week, I helped spark a debate about the Arab-Israeli conflict. Last year, my rejection of our response to Sept. 11 caused a similar stir. The paper's website is filled with support and disapproval of my opinions, and I have received handwritten letters concerning my work.

I admit that may have sounded headstrong. Perhaps it was, but does it not show that time can have meaning in more perspectives than financial? I don't over generalize by believing that men and women treat time as a commodity. I have yet to meet the adult who spends time without the greatest of caution. Time spells the end of tests, and the withering of figures. It harkens the climax of disease, and the end of a buzz.

The two men who I have come to despise most in our post-Sept. 11 society, George W. Bush and Ariel Sharon, know the value of time. They know who wants to spend it, and when. Unfortunately, they also control it; on Imperialist wrists do today's watches rest. The Palestinians are also aware of the value of time. Israel has taught them such, from monetary, military, and decency perspectives. According to the CIA, unemployment in the West Bank hovers at 40 percent (2000), compared to 9 percent in Israel and 6 percent in the United States.

Why the gap?

Real per capita GDP for the West Bank and Gaza Strip (WBGS) declined by 36.1 percent between 1992 and 1996 due to falling incomes and population growth. According to the CIA, "the downturn in economic activity was largely the result of Israeli closure policies – the imposition of border closures in response to security incidents in Israel – which disrupted established labor and commodity market relationships between Israel and the WBGS."

This downturn spurred two rises in unemployment. During the 1980s, joblessness in the WBGS hung at five percent; by 1995 it had risen to over 20 percent. To counter the increase in poverty, Israel began slowing its use of closures in 1997. In 1998, Israel initiated friendlier policies designed to improve the flow of Palestinian goods and labor. And these measures worked, for awhile.

The real GDP began to recover, growing by five percent in 1998 and six percent in 1999. But, "recovery was upended in the last quarter of 2000 with the outbreak of Palestinian violence, which triggered tight Israeli closures of Palestinian self-rule areas and a severe disruption of trade and labor movements," the CIA said.

This week, America used time against the Palestinians, with a little help from Israel. Palestinian casualties outnumber Israeli casualties by three-to-one. Cities and settlements have been crushed. And the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem – one of Christianity's most sacred buildings – smolders from Israeli fire.

Kowtowing to international pressure – particularly from the United Nations – and eager to rally support for his inevitable invasion of Iraq, Bush pressed Sharon to pull his forces out of the West Bank. Sharon denied him, enervated with jingoism. On Monday, Saddam Hussein suspended the export of oil from Iraq for thirty days, desperate to deafen the American war drums audible in the distance. Therefore, the President dispatched Colin Powell, arming him with a mandate to negotiate an Israeli withdraw.

But Powell didn't head straight to Israel or Palestine. Although the invasion has lasted for 10 days, Powell started his peacekeeping tour in Morocco. According to the New York Times, King Mohammed VI asked Powell if he thought "it would be more important to go to Jerusalem first" just as television cameras began rolling. After the meeting, Powell told reporters it was important to consult with Arab allies, and with European Union officials at a meeting in Madrid on Wednesday and Thursday, to prepare for negotiations.

The administration can rally support for Bush's Saddam crusade by appearing to help the Palestinians. He can intimidate Iraq, also, by prolonging the Palestinian massacre. And we can appease our staunch ally, Israel, by giving Sharon a few more days before making demands. Yesterday, following a request by the President for complete evacuation, he began a partial retreat by evacuating two West Bank towns.

However, this semi-compliance means nothing. Tuesday's New York Times reported: "The [Israeli] army said helicopters fired at least 20 missiles at targets in the Jenin refugee camp, home to about 15,000 people. Casualties were reported to be heavy, though exact numbers were not available."

I can't be angry at my small paycheck. At least it buys me a sleeve of golf balls. At least I can play golf. At least I can walk down the street to the golf course. My time has value. The Palestinians' time is worthless. They are made to wait, even in the face of slaughter. Their hourglass smashed, their sands run like blood into the streets.

40 oz. Movie Reviews With Mike G.

COURTESY INTERNET

By Mike G.
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The research for this particular column was so intense tha: it actually broke my television. The combination of videos was so devastating that both my television and VCR don't work anymore. They gave up. And now, without further ado, the movies that broke my TV and VCR, and the 40s I consumed while watching them.

DROP ZONE VHS
1995
Steel Reserve Malt Liquor 40 oz.

The main reason I rented Drop Zone was because the film's villain, "Ty Moncrief," is portrayed by that scruffy, blond, large tusked idol of the silver screen and the straight-to-video, Gary Busey. There is something irresistible about the man. I'm not gay, but if I were, I would do my damndest to hook up with "The Buse."

I decided to start the marathon viewing/drinking session with a bang by breaking out the Steel Reserve "High Gravity Lager" 40 oz. This stuff is absurd. The first time I saw Steel Reserve, I knew it was good malt liquor because a kid with a mullet, wearing overalls (one strap style, like in middle school) was drinking it in Butterfield, where I lived last year. Yes, Butterfield, you guessed right. I was "one of them," Like Gary Busey, Steel Reserve isn't the tastiest thing in the world, but like Gary Busey, it is incredibly strong. I once drank this num-num juice out of a tall can, and it was pretty sweet and delicious. Out of my preferred beverage container, the 40-oz bottle, it is very tart and acetic, with a slight hint of toilet bowl as it hits the back of your tongue.

The highlight of Drop Zone is definitely when Gary Busey plummets to his death. There is a prolonged shot of The Buse screaming into the camera, teeth bared for an adoring public ("public" = Mike G). I played this scene back several times using the slow motion feature on my VCR, which was most likely one of the major reasons my VCR broke that night. I've yet to see any piece of entertainment technology that can withstand prolonged exposure to Gary Busey

THE END VHS
Colt 45 Malt Liquor 40 oz.

The End, starring Burt Reynolds is one of the most amazing things ever to be committed to celluloid. Professor Marty Norden should teach a 500 level Communications class strictly about this film. The movie opens with a black screen and the sound of Burt Reynolds peeing into a cup. Can you possibly think of anything in the entire spectrum of human experience that could conceivably match that viewing experience, with an ice cold Colt 45 in your clutches?

If Burt Reynolds ever got arrested for killing someone, he could plead insanity and feature this film as evidence. First of all, he directed it. That is why there is a very long scene where he thoughtfully plays with his chest hair. I watched this scene repeatedly in slow motion, which probably melted the inner workings of my VCR.

The Colt is a refreshing beverage, preferred by such cultural luminaries as Jesse Vucna, from the seminal local band The Sharks, and the extreme local MC Korpus Krispy of Brocktune. It is easy on the pipes, and the only alcoholic beverage to have Billy Dee Williams as its spokesman.

The End is basically, in Burt Reynolds' own words, "A suicide picture." The film is about Burt's attempts to comically kill himself after he finds out that he has a toxic blood disease. I can't express in words how completely insane this film is. Example: Burt Reynolds before attempting cunnilingus on Sally Field: "This might be my last meal!" followed by a sex scene where Sally Field pets a cat while being boinked by Hairy Burt. Good lord, save us, for we have sinned.

The cherry on the top of this sordid movie pie is watching Burt swim to his death to the stirring chords of Frank Sinatra's "I Did It My Way." Oh yeah, I should probably mention that Burt and Dom Deluise make out at one point.

PHAT BEACH VHS

Olde English '800' 40 oz.

I saved my favorites for last. Phat Beach is basically a film that would have been made if one of the Fat Boys had made a successful acting career for himself. It is about a hefty young man and his slick-talking friend Durell and their attempts to get laid at... PHAT BEACH! This is one the greatest films about gender relations ever made, and should be featured prominently in every gender-related class taught in higher education.

Olde English '800' is The Forty Ounce. Baseball has Babe Ruth, basketball has Michael, Wu Tang has Method Man, Full House has John Stamos, and malt liquor has OE. It is the ultimate. No other forty-oz. beverage will ever surpass the level of excellence that is manifested in OE. This is, after all, the subject of the classic song "Eight Ball" by Eazy E, where he talks about driving his car with a "Forty in my lap and it's freezing my balls!" The greatest people in the spotlight of the last 15 years of American culture have been OE fanatics. Let me supply you with a partial list:

The Beastie Boys
Run DMC
Old Dirty Bastard
Jake and Nick Deeze
Kool Keith

There are others in Wu-Tang... we swear. It's not just da Meth.

By Eric Goodman and Eric Soderstrom
COLLEGIAN STAFF

WU-TANG CLAN
Mullins Center
April 5

The Wu-Tang Clan swarmed the Mullins Center on Friday, April 5, and put on a two-hour show that really only gave a taste of what could have actually been an extremely entertaining hip-hop show.

Goodman's thoughts...

Unlike most Wu-Tang shows, this one actually started on schedule as the opening act, Rahzel, took the stage at a little after 8 p.m. and began to showcase his beat-boxing skills. I was very much looking forward to seeing the former beat-boxer from The Roots live and in person thinking that he would do things other than what I have already heard him do on his debut album, Make The Music 2000.

Rahzel was impressive when he did his "If Your Mother Only Knew" song in which he somehow beat-boxes and does the vocals at the same time, but I've heard it so many times that it didn't really have the same effect as it did the first time. Overall, Rahzel did a good job for an opening act, but he really needs to incorporate new material to get his true fans more into his live performances.

I expected to see Wu-Tang enter the stage after Rahzel performed, but unfortunately the audience was subjected to 45 minutes of pure trash from one of the Wu-affiliates, The Black Knights. The three-man group from the West Coast totally spoiled my interest from the moment they set foot on the stage because of their lack of a DJ.

I realize I might have a biased opinion by being a hip-hop DJ, but when you do a live show you simply must have a DJ there behind the turntables laying down your beats or else you wind up looking like three guys doing karaoke at the local bar.

The Black Knights did not impress one bit, even when they showed some respect to the Jewish community and did a song called "Bar Mitzvah" explaining that, "in our religion a boy truly becomes a man when he gets all that pussy." I understand that RZA wanted to promote his groups on the latest Killa Beez album, but he should consider evicting The Black Knights from the Wu-hive.

Finally, the time had arrived as Wu-Tang's U-God took to the microphone. The lack of a serious crowd response proved that no one was interested in hearing one of the lesser known members of the group doing his solo offerings and you could sense that they were eagerly anticipating the arrival of the Wu's heavy hitters such as Ghostface Killah, GZA/Genius and, of course, Method Man.

The format of this show was designed to introduce each member of the group as a soloist while progressively bringing out other members to join in on collaborative efforts, but it only amounted to a snippet collection of some of the Clan's more popular songs. In addition, the efforts to have Method Man make such a grand entrance at the end of the show meant that Wu-Tang couldn't do any songs that featured Mr. Mef until he came on with only about a half hour left in the show. That meant that the crowd was cheated out of hearing one of GZA's best songs, "ShadowBoxing" which features Method Man, because it was obvious that they were trying to save him up as the last member to step into the arena.

This concert had so much potential but fell short because of the attempts to make like it was Method Man who was headlining the show.

Each performer gave a good show as individuals and were even better when they came together to do classic group joints such as "Wu-Tang Clan Ain't Nothin To F' With" and "Reunited," but I had just wished that they had done more songs in their entirety. In addition, it could have been so simple to bring Rahzel back on stage to lay down some of his famous beat-boxed Wu-Tang beats and have the Clan rap over them to close out the show – but I guess none of the show's producers thought of that.

Overall, this show satisfied my appetite for Wu-Tang but it was like getting served a variety of appetizers when the chefs had all the resources to cook up a delicious full course meal.

Soderstrom's thoughts...

Friday night's Wu-Tang show proved one thing. Half this campus thinks Method Man is the only great MC the Wu has to offer. Sure, he's leaked some classic, classic tracks. But I've had enough of him for a while. After How High and the countless number of MTV appearances, the Ticallion Stallion is becoming played out. Minus the missing Cappadonna, the incarcerated Ol' Dirty, U-God, the laryngitis-plagued Inspectah Deck, and the rather boring Masta Killa, there were four other legends of hip-hop there.

The RZA and Rackwon did their thing, just as well as Meth did, but they got no love. Ghostface Killah and The GZA put on the two best performances of the night but they didn't get half the applause Meth did. And it's not that I hate Johnny Blaze. It's just that he's not doing anything new. At close to 40 years of age, the Genius is still absolutely ripping it better than anyone. He highlights the Wu's latest album, Iron Flag, and his new single "Fame" is better than every song on the Clan's fourth release (not to mention The Wu). He's always been the true head of Wu-Tang and will always be. There's a reason he drops the first verse on "Reunited," the first track from Wu-Tang forever; the GZA is timeless. Meth, however, is stuck in the past. The How High soundtrack was weak and was only held up by songs that were released five years ago, "Bring the Pain," and "All I Need" are hip-hop classics and remain on my play list. But they're old. Meth has yet to impress since.

Like GZA, Ghostface is challenging the times. His screechy, high-pitched, emotional breakdown sound is something new. Ghost gives it all on stage and with his flashy fashion sense, is the most intriguing Shaolin warrior. But again, he's not Meth. So most of you have no clue who Ghost is. Take a chance and take the How High soundtrack out of your CD player. Yeah, the last two Wu-albums weren't too well done. But that doesn't mean that everyone but Meth died. Wake up.

311 WITH HOOBASTANK
Worcester Palladium
March 30

Hoobastank played a full opening set, but the vocals were hard to pick out over the wall of sound coming from the PA. TRL fanatics in the crowd enjoyed their set; they were energetic and had a pretty impressive stage presence. A surprise was to hear the bands new single "Crawling in the Dark" played early in the set, as is often the case with "hit" songs. Their sound was very cliche, and did not elicit a resounding "wow" from the audience.

However, 311 opened up their thrilling set with a spectacular intro. Mysterious darkness and fog shrouded the stage and set the mood for an explosive night. The lights flashed on with the first note of "Beautiful Disaster" and the crowd went wild. Band members Hexum and Mahoney played simultaneous solos throughout the song – playing different notes at the same time, creating an effect as if it were just one guitar.

The crowd was wild on the floor as the show began. The energy amazingly never died through the entire set. As the crowd got crazier the band became more animated. Dusting off some of the older and fierier melodies such as "Freak Out," from Music and "Omaha Stylee," and "Nutsymtom" from Grassroots. As much as the band's sound continues to evolve,

Sorority Boys: even Gary Busey looks better in drag

Ladies and Gentlemen, I present to you the hottest sorority in all of Alabama.

SORORITY BOYS
Directed by Wally Wolodarsky
Starring Barry Watson, Michael Rosenbaum and Harland Williams
Playing at CineMark Hadley

If you ate Grammy to go see the new teen sex comedy Sorority Boys and I don't think many of you ate let me spare you the agony and discuss the movie's comic high point. Late in the movie two of the heroes, in full transvestite gear, get in an epic knockdown fight with each other. Knee shots to the crotch, pink cracked over heads, bodies tumbling down stairs – the works. Eventually our two combatants wind up armed and engaged in a mock swordfight using long, rubbery phallic dildos in Easter M&M pastel colors. There I rest my case, inspiration.

Sorority Boys is an exhausted, sour retread of the American Pie movies. There are plenty of the usual sniggering jokes centered on sex, body parts and homosexuality (or how "bad" it is in another example of the rampant homophobia of teen movie filmmakers) as well as views of women so rooted in adolescent sexual anxiety that it seems like the filmmakers never made it through puberty. The movie is little more than a Girls Gone Wild tape with a heavy, slipshod plot. If you only go to movies to see naked women, you may like Sorority Boys. But I would then have serious issues about your contributions to mankind.

The story is an even thinner bit of plastic then "Bosom Buddies." Dave (Barry Watson, "7th Heaven"), Adam (Michael Rosenbaum, "Smallville") and Robert, a.k.a. Dooler (Harland Williams) are framed for embezzling party funds from their frat and kicked out of the house. Poor and with no place to live, they hit on a plan. They dress as women and pledge Delta Omicron Gamma, the "ugly sorority" that offers free room and board and a chance to find a way back into the Kappa Omega Kappa house. The guys disguise themselves as Daisy, Adina and Roberta, move in and get to see how the other sex lives. Dave, of course, finds himself falling in love with the sorority's president, Leah (Melissa Sagemiller). Hijinks ensue.

For the plot, that's pretty much it. Oh yeah, the guys do learn a new appreciation for girls and teach the girls self-esteem. (Only in a movie of this high caliber would it be a lesson for a woman-ignorant guy to teach self-esteem to women.) But after all the ludicrous practical jokes, it just seems like whipped cream. To demonstrate the comic creativity of the movie, the filmmakers have brilliantly named the sorority DOG and the fraternity KOS. There are jokes about date rape drugs, homemade porn tapes and unruly erections – none of them funny. After twenty minutes, I was ready to shoot myself. Unfortunately, the movie is 96 minutes long.

What makes the movie truly bad isn't how unfunny or imaginatively impaired it is, it's how offensive this muck is. Sorority Boys has the stench of a tuna salad left in the Arizona sun too long. Director Wally Wolodarsky has all the insight into the female mind of a smut writer for a Larry Flynt magazine. Wolodarsky and his writers, Joe Jarvis and Greg Coolidge have barely grown beyond seventh grade homeroom. Because they have a "message" about respecting women tacked on at the end, they think they can get away with that same disrespectful attitude. They show bare breasts whenever they get a chance, treat the "popular" girls as living blow-up dolls, and give the "ugly" girls only one freakish characteristic apiece. There's a rumble-voiced gentle giant, a French emigre with a wisp of a moustache, and a girl with a really loud "Noo Yawk" accent. Funny enough, the girls are actually attractive, especially Yvonne Scio as the Gallic girl who's good-looking even with facial hair.

The hateful misogyny is excruciating, but at least the men don't get off any easier. Every man seen on screen, with the possible exception of Dave, comes off as an arrogant, sexist, sex-crazed jerk. They are peacocks without the tail feathers. The only ugly thing about the vile Sorority Boys isn't the sorority, but Wolodarsky's hateful misanthropic view of mankind.

their older songs will never get played out.

The centerpiece of the show was "Applied Science" (also from Grassroots). If you have ever seen 311 live, the song gives Sexton a drum solo worth a few minutes. Recently the solo has consisted of Chad playing a solo that leads into a new "Tribal Drum Solo" with the entire band creating a syncopated drum line, consisting of many layers of rhythm.

The rest of the set drove straight through the shaking hips and dancing legs of everyone on the floor. 311 showed a newer and mellowed version of "All Mixed Up," giving something for the ladies in the house. The song's new vocal harmony breakdown between the final verse and chorus even gave it an updated title "All Re-mixed Up." How clever. The newer version as a more reggae feel to it – very chill.

311 ended the three-song encore as they end every show, with "Feels So Good." During the song Hexum made his way to the top of a PA speaker, after exclaiming the lyric "Here I Go..." he made a belly flop stage dive into the sold out crowd. What a way to end a show that showed us everything imaginable. Power comprised with a touch of class.

Loeb has her cake and eats it too with 3rd album

By Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

LISA LOEB
Cake and Pie
A & M Records

What is the appeal of Lisa Loeb? She crept quietly onto the music scene a few years ago with the soft-pop attractiveness of the song "Stay," and not too long afterwards showed up on the radio briefly with "Do You Sleep?" from her second album, a large improvement from the former. Nonetheless, with no offense meant to Ms. Loeb, there really is nothing particularly amazing about her music, even though you might hear the song "The Way It Is" or "Everyday" soon on a radio near you.

For some reason she has still managed to last in an industry where the phrase "female rock and roll" is synonymous with "one-hit wonder." Yet here we have her third album, Cake and Pie, where she sheds her band name Nine Stories, but doesn't offer much more change than that. Take that as you may; obviously, to some people that suits just fine, because there must be some demand for her if she has continued to outplay, outwit and outlast her competition, whether it be female or male.

But I don't see any explanations here on Cake and Pie. The strongest track on the album could be "Someone You Should Know," a feel-good tune about the realization of all the good things in life that a person just doesn't see. It's been done before, but the simple melody is what will leave you humming the tune afterwards. However, I'd be surprised to see this played on the radio, because of its sugary complexion. The song has a heavier focus on the background chorus (sounds like little kids to me), drowning out Loeb's vocals during the refrains, which populate most of the song. The song is stuck somewhere between the bubblegum sound of girl band B'Witched, and Alanis Morissette's contemporary female rock.

Unlike many of her counterparts in the music biz, I commend Ms. Loeb on writing all the songs on the album, which is part of the reason why they may all sound the same. While writing music is, I'm sure, a daunting task, especially when critics are out to destroy you for their living, there is also something to be said for switching gears on an album of pop rock music from time to time to explore territory that is not traditional of the typical feel of the majority of songs. Pop rock audiences are among the hardest to please because they want just that – the popular sound. If you rehash it over three albums, with only slight variations on the theme, it's less than easy to stay in the limelight. Loeb, however, has succeeded at doing this to some extent.

Loeb's hushed and sultry voice is attractive, to be sure, especially in the song "Payback," where a wailing guitar out of Led Zeppelin and again a faint choir "oohing" and "aahing" to the pulsating rhythm of a jazzy drum set echo her. The lyrics do not share in the sexual innuendos served up by the music, having nothing to do with a steamy affair, or even a brokenhearted person getting revenge like the title might indicate. Instead, it centers on a break-up of a relationship (that's a novel idea!) and a walk down a pretty impassionate Memory Lane. Is having your van break down in the middle of a rainstorm the best remembrance of a relationship that Loeb can come up with?

Many of the songs, including the two aforementioned ones, are enjoyably sweet and sticky, which may be what the album's title, Cake and Pie, is meant to represent. "Too Fast Driving," on the other hand, is perhaps the filmy residue you get at the bottom of a baking pan. Like its title suggests, it is the frantic drum-and-guitar combination that is nowadays dubbed a "road song." But the numbing melody and title is repeated nonstop, as well as a sound effect that has the vocals fade in and out, louder and softer, one speaker to the other. The result is a chaotic, underdeveloped mess.

On her third album, Lisa Loeb does not as much grow into a better musician but stays where she and many listeners (and most importantly, her record company) are comfortable; more power to her to last so long standing still, a feat that not many other musicians can maintain. Loeb, so it seems, can have her cake and pie and eat it too.

Lisa Loeb just looks so cute in those glasses.

alive to allow Wheeler and Pam Wilson to deliver two more RBI hits. Aisha Franke added an RBI double in the fourth to cap off the scoring for the Maroon and White.

"After the first game, we talked about how we let a lot pitches go, so the second game we just wanted to come out and be more aggressive," Cross said.

The outcome could have been far uglier for Vermont, as UMass stranded the bases loaded in the second inning, leaving five total ducks on the pond in the game.

Arnold was dominant in her outing, allowing only two Catamounts to reach and permitting none to even touch second base. She finished the day with five strikeouts and zero walks, her second consecutive strong outing at the Complex.

On the mound, Scott Ratliff came on in relief in the sixth and pitched 3.1 scoreless innings. The freshman lefty didn't allow a hit or a walk, and was sight-for-sore-eyes for a team that has had trouble getting anyone out.

"It's good to see Ratliff come in and do the job because we were 0-for-2 (Julio Ramos and Neil Sheller gave up six runs in 5.1 innings) up to that point," Stone said.

"We needed to start the week off, and getting the first game as a win is huge," Senez added. "We just need some wins right now."

For Holy Cross (7-15, 3-5 Patriot League), Peter Summa and Dale Johnson led the team with two hits apiece, while starting pitcher Drew Bigda lined an opposite field homer in his first at bat.

Next up for UMass is archrival UConn, which hosts today's 3 p.m. contest after last month's game between the two squads in Storrs was rained out.

Jeffries chooses NBA over Indiana

By Jason Recker
INDIANA DAILY STUDENT (INDIANA U.)

(U-WIRE) BLOOMINGTON, Ind. – He's gone.

One week after Indiana's loss to Maryland in the NCAA Tournament championship game, IU sophomore Jared Jeffries declared himself eligible for the June NBA Draft, forgoing his final two years of eligibility.

"All my life, I've had two dreams – the first was to hear my name called on college graduation day," Jeffries said in a press conference in Assembly Hall Monday afternoon, when he made the formal announcement. "The second was to hear my name called in the NBA Draft."

Jeffries, a Bloomington High School North graduate, said he plans to hire an agent as early as Tuesday. That decision will make him ineligible to return to IU for his junior season. The former Indiana Mr. Basketball had until May 12 to enter the draft.

Jeffries becomes the second player in as many years to leave the program early. Kirk Haston left IU after his junior season and was selected 16th by the Charlotte Hornets. Haston, who redshirted a season for the Hoosiers, earned his degree before leaving.

Jeffries, a communications major, will finish classes this semester at IU and said he plans to earn his degree in "four or five summers."

Joining Jeffries for the press conference were his mother, father, grandmother and brother. IU coach Mike Davis was not present, as he was home with the flu. Davis' wife, Tamilya, was there. Jeffries said he notified Davis of his decision Wednesday, but the two have not spoken in the last 48 hours.

"He was very supportive," said Jeffries of Davis. "I'm going to talk to him all the time. We're very good friends. Maybe he will coach my son someday (in the NBA). You never know."

Jeffries, who averaged 15 points and 7.6 rebounds per game and was named the Big Ten Player of the Year, fizzled during both of IU's Final Four games. The 6-foot-10, 215-pound Jeffries scored just 16 points in the two games and finished his career against Maryland by going four of 11 from the field.

"I don't know if you can base a decision on one or two games," Jeffries said. "I would have loved to have scored 20 points and win a national title, but that didn't happen, so you can't worry about that."

Jeffries finished one point shy of becoming the 36th player in IU history to record 1,000 career points and would have been just the sixth sophomore to do so.

His naysayers point to his disappointing performance in the Final Four and his lack of bulk as deterrents for entering the draft.

"He could use another year to round out his game," Rivalshoops.com college basketball analyst Mike Sullivan said. "I think it would help tremendously. There's so much homework you have to do; hopefully, he's done that."

At least one teammate was sure Jeffries is ready now.

"With his talent, he'd be crazy not to go," IU senior guard Dane Fife said after IU's loss to Maryland.

Jeffries said he isn't sure where he'll be selected, but seems confident he'll be a first-round pick. Jeffries plans to attend a pre-draft camp in Chicago, after which he will have a better idea regarding his draft position.

After deciding after his freshman season to continue at IU rather than head for the draft, Jeffries said he knew his intentions nearly all season. His parents asked him to stay after his freshman season, but saw nothing wrong with his decision to leave now.

"The only way I was going to influence that is if I felt he was doing something outlandish," said Jeffries' father, Tom.

Tom and Jared spent the weekend fishing in Kentucky and discussed the younger Jeffries' future there, after the clamor of IU's first Final Four run since 1992 died down.

But by then, the IU standout needed only reassurance. After spending time this season talking to players his same age who have entered the NBA Draft early – including former Indiana high school standout Zach Randolph – Jeffries decided it was time to go.

"My dad made a very good point: The best way to prepare is on the job," Jeffries said.

"I'm going to prepare myself for the NBA, and the best way to do that is on the job."

With an often-criticized body, Jeffries said he understands he will have to spend time adding weight and rounding out his game. He said he wasn't sure what position he'll play, and Sullivan agrees, saying Jeffries doesn't fit into any prototypical NBA position.

Jeffries said he's not making the decision to silence doubters and said he hopes IU fans anxious for one more year with Jeffries in the Hoosier frontcourt understand his move.

During his two-year stay at IU, Jeffries helped IU return to its glory of nearly a decade ago by leading the Hoosiers to their first Big Ten title since 1993 and the first NCAA championship game since 1987.

"I realize in no way am I a finished basketball product," Jeffries said. "I know I must develop in order to meet the demands of NBA basketball, but there's no looking back now. At a certain point, you have to make decisions for yourself. I would love to be back with this team. But, I also feel like the opportunity for me to play in the NBA is now."

Title IX: a look at the impact of landmark law

By Owen Bochner
CORNELL DAILY SUN (CORNELL U.)

(U-WIRE) ITHACA, N.Y. – In 1972 the U.S. Congress passed a landmark piece of legislation requiring all educational opportunities to be equal for men and women. This legislation, Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, is perhaps the best known piece of civil rights law in the world.

The law states, "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance" (Sec. 1681 a).

What this sentence has meant to collegiate athletics over the past 30 years has been of the utmost importance.

Though wide ranging, the most widely applied aspect of Title IX is the requirement that collegiate athletic departments offer the same opportunities for female athletes as they do for male athletes. The result has been a tremendous increase of participants and teams in NCAA women's sports.

"I think the enforcement of Title IX served as a catalyst for the entire women's movement, and I'm particularly thrilled with the specific impact it's had on athletics," Cornell University women's lacrosse head coach Jenny Graap said. "Title IX is the reason why I have my job."

The NCAA determines compliance with Title IX based on three basic criteria: financial assistance, interest and ability, and the equivalence of benefits and opportunities.

Beyond that requirement, athletic departments that have successfully implemented Title IX have what former Cornell Athletic Director Laing Kennedy refers to as "equality in philosophy."

"[This] philosophy includes coaching, facilities, scheduling, support availability and sports medicine," Kennedy said.

Currently the athletic director at Kent State University, Kennedy served in that same capacity at Cornell from 1983 to 1994. During his tenure, Cornell added the women's soccer, softball and crew teams.

In addition, the athletic facilities used by all Red teams underwent significant capital improvements in order to increase the opportunities available to athletes of both sexes at Cornell. The original field house, Reis Tennis Center and Oxley Equestrian Center were constructed. Schoellkopf Field was renovated, with a new press box and turf installed. Alumni Fields, used by many teams for practice, also upgraded were during this time.

"This was the backdrop to provide equal opportunity," Kennedy recalled. "The same facilities were used for lacrosse and field hockey as for football."

The Collyer Boathouse on Cayuga Inlet also was built, providing a home for all three of Cornell's crews.

"We were very committed to providing enrichment to all students," said Kennedy, who continues that commitment today at Kent State, where many men's and women's teams have reached levels of prominence in the Mid-American Conference.

However, the push towards equality between men's and women's sports has hit several bumps along the road. There have been many emotional, public disputes since the passage of Title IX over how best to implement the law and at what cost.

More than 40 lawsuits have been filed against colleges regarding Title IX and alleged civil rights violations.

An example is the 1992 case Jennifer Roberts et al v. Colorado State University. In this case, members of the Colorado State softball team, which was disbanded along with the baseball team due to lack of funding, sued the University on the grounds the athletic offerings did not adequately meet the needs of female athletes. The softball team was reinstated for the 1994 season after the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit upheld a lower court's finding in favor of the softball players. CSU now is recognized as one of the most equitable athletic departments in the NCAA.

Around the time of the Colorado State suit, the Cornell athletic department was forced to cut five teams due to budget restraints. The sprint football, men's and women's gymnastics, and men's and women's fencing teams all were disbanded. After a lawsuit was filed by the women's gymnastics and fencing teams, those, along with the sprint football team were reinstated.

According to Kennedy, the decision to drop those teams was based primarily on the availability of facilities needed to support the programs.

"When sports are dropped or added," he explained, "they are primarily financial decisions [rather than decisions based on Title IX.]"

Women's gymnastics coach Paul Beckwith, who was hired in 1994 when the team was reinstated, has seen both sides of the issue first hand.

"People think it's a women's rights issue but it's not," Beckwith said. "Men can sue under Title IX the same way. They're granted equal opportunity."

Formerly the men's and women's gymnastics coach at Radford University, Beckwith laments the fact as a result in part of Title IX, men's gymnastics teams quickly are becoming things of the past.

"[In some cases] the only way to give everybody an equal shake was to eliminate men's programs," Beckwith observed, "and that was not the intent of the law. The intent was to increase the opportunities for women, not decrease the opportunities for men."

A tremendous amount of controversy has surrounded decisions of athletic departments to cut smaller sports in order to continue to support big-name programs. In 1982 there were 79 men's gymnastics teams on the NCAA varsity level. Last year that number was 24.

On the flip side, the number of schools sponsoring women's basketball teams has increased from 705 in 1982 to 995 in 2001. And the number of football programs has increase from 497 to 603.

The Minutewomen will travel to Rhode Island for a key Atlantic 10 conference match tomorrow at 3:00 p.m. The match was rescheduled from April 3 due to rain.

Men's Lacrosse

University of Massachusetts freshman attackman Craig Conn earned ECAC Lacrosse Rookie of the Week honors following the UMass victory over UMBC this past Saturday.

Conn won a season-high 17 of 23 faceoffs and scored a goal as the Minutemen defeated UMBC, 18-7. His domination in the face-off circle allowed the Minutemen to control possession throughout the game. Conn improved his season totals to 54 wins in 102 faceoffs (.529), and three goals and six assists through nine games.

This is the second time this season Conn has been named ECAC Lacrosse Rookie of the Week. He also earned the honor on March 25, following a pair of Massachusetts victories over Albany and Hartford.

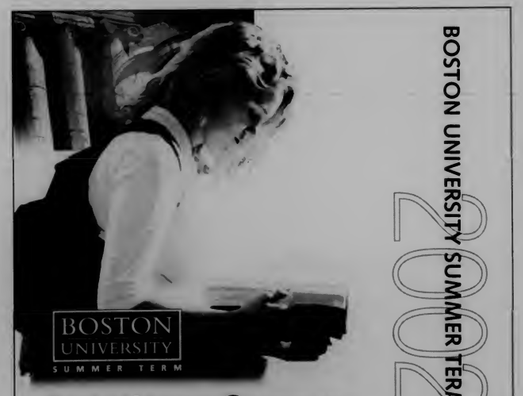
Massachusetts is 8-1 overall and 3-0 in the ECAC this season. The Minutemen are currently ranked No. 8 in the latest national poll and have won eight straight games since dropping the season-opener in overtime to Hofstra. Massachusetts returns to action with a road game against New England rival Yale on Saturday at 1:00 p.m.

Women's Water Polo

The University of Massachusetts women's water polo team went 1-2 in three conference games this weekend. The Minutewomen trounced Connecticut College, 15-1, and fell to Harvard, 6-3 and No. 17 Brown, 8-6.

In the first game against Harvard, junior Amy Black led the squad as she scored a pair of goals. Junior Kelly Chasny scored the other Massachusetts goal, while senior Megan Perry, junior Mattie Newell and sophomore Shauna Nielsen each dished out an assist. Black also recorded four steals.

Newell led the Maroon and White with four goals against Brown. Perry and Nielsen scored the other two goals in the 8-6 loss to the 17th-ranked Brown Bears. Newell and Black also had an assist apiece, while Nielsen notched five steals. In net, freshman Amelia Degenkolb made six saves.



The Minutewomen bounced back to beat Connecticut College, 15-1 in the night-cap. Junior Jacy Mackey scored four goals to lead the attack. Senior Anne Dettloff scored three goals for UMass, while freshman Kelly Barber, freshman Colleen Wasson and sophomore Ronda Dykstra each added a pair of goals. Freshman Melissa Goldberg dished out three assists and tallied three steals. Mackey had five steals, while Dettloff, Wasson and Nielsen each had four. In net, sophomore Emily Knight made five saves in the second half.

Massachusetts will next compete in the ECAC Championship, April 13-14, in Cambridge, Mass.

Crusaders sent back to Middle Ages

UMass cruises to victory; posts season-high in runs

By Jesse Greenspan
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Prior to yesterday's matinee contest with Holy Cross, the Massachusetts baseball team had been slumping at the plate, posting a mere .266 batting average through the first 22 games of the season.

That slump is now over.

The Minutemen (9-14, 2-7 Atlantic 10) pounded out 15 runs and 18 hits (both season-highs) against the Crusaders at Earl Lorden Field in Amherst, busting out in a big way against five separate Holy Cross pitchers.

UMass	15
HC	6

"It is easy to hit when the pitching isn't so tough, and maybe that was the case today," UMass coach Mike Stone said, downplaying his team's success. "You never see as good pitching mid-week as you do during the weekend.

"Now if we can get six, seven, eight [wins] in a row we will be in good shape."

Hitting stars were numerous for the Maroon and White, but once again it was catcher Chris Morgan and third baseman Aaron Senez doing most of the damage.

Morgan, who is leading the team in homeruns with five, went 3-for-5 on the day with two runs scored and five RBIs. Senez, who has torched the competition thus far to the tune of a team-high .397 average was nearly as effective, going 2-for-4 with three runs and two ribbies of his own.

"I'm seeing the ball well and that is the most important thing," Senez said. "And I have been patient – just waiting for my pitch."

However, Morgan and Senez were far from the only hitting stars, as Jim Klett (three hits), Cullan Maumus (two hits), Adam Stojanowski (two hits) and Connell Clark (three-run homer in the sixth) all contributed to the victory.

In the early going, the two teams battled it out relatively evenly, as they ended the fourth inning tied at four. In the top of the fifth, the Crusaders took the lead on a Bill Andruskevich RBI double to right center, but it would be short lived.

The Minutemen compiled a four-run rally in the fifth and a seven run outburst in the sixth to put the game away.

"We battled early, but people swung the bat and that makes a difference," Stone said. "We still struggle on the mound, but overall, it was a pretty good ballgame."

Senez began the rally with a double to left-center and scored on Morgan's seeing-eye single to right. After a Maumus single, Holy Cross went to the bullpen, but it was to no avail, as left Altieri walked and Stojanowski drilled a two-RBI single to left. Altieri would later come around to score the final run of the inning on a Matt Boulanger 12-for-31 sacrifice fly.

In the sixth, the Maroon and White had three runs before the Crusaders had recorded an out, as Morgan launched a bomb over the right field fence to drive home Klett and Senez. Maumus singled to keep the rally going, advanced to second on a wild pitch and came home on Boulanger's one-out single. The final three runs of the inning came on Clark's opposite field blast, and made the score 13-6.

Softball juggernaut crushes UVM

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For all you non-animal lovers out there, a catamount is a member of the mountain lion family. One would think that these creatures would be aggressive, ferocious and vicious.

The Vermont Catamounts, however, did nothing yesterday to live up to their namesake.

The Massachusetts softball team started off the doubleheader slowly with a 3-1 win, but exploded in the nightcap for 10 runs to send Vermont limping back to Burlington. Kelli Arnold pitched a one-hitter in the second contest to tame the Catamounts and lift the Minutewomen to their 15th straight win overall, and 35th in a row at the Softball Complex.

"I just thought we looked so out of kilter in the first game of the place," Head Coach Elaine Sortino said. "We definitely were not ourselves at the plate [in the first game]; quite frankly I thought it took us seven innings to get into the next seven.

"I have to give them credit because they came right out [in the second game] and did what they needed to do, and set the tone," she added.

Vermont's Angie Tortaro held the Minutewoman bats relatively quiet in game one, as she gave up only three runs on seven hits, but was let down by her defense early on. Ashley Bakken scored the first UMass run on a botched double play ball by the Catamounts, their second error of the inning. Brandi Cross followed with a sacrifice fly to up the score to 2-0.

The visitors sliced the deficit in half on an unearned run in the second, but the Minutewomen grabbed the two-run lead right back in the fourth, as freshman Denise Denis drilled a single to plate Anna Percy to give the Maroon and White all the insurance it would need. Jen Hadley picked up the complete game victory for UMass, allowing only six hits and one unearned run, as she K'd eight Catamount batters in the process. The win marked the 12th victory of the season for the Bristol, Conn. native.

"Jen's game was deceiving, I thought she pitched a pretty good game," Sortino said. "They were just kinda stabbing at the ball."

The dormant UMass bats came out of hibernation in the second contest, however, as the Minutewomen erupted at the expense of hapless Catamount pitcher Kara Massey. Bakken started a one-out barrage with a harmless infield single, but Scooter Wheeler blasted an RBI double off the right field wall to grab the early lead. Cross, however, one-upped Wheeler with a towering tape-measure rocket to right center that not only cleared the fence, but the secondary fencing outside the complex.

"I got a good pitch; I was looking for something waist-high, and she threw it in there," Cross said, mentioning that although the count was 3-0, Sortino had no problem letting her swing away.

"Coach has been really good about giving us the green light; she has confidence in us and we have confidence in ourselves," she added.

UMass tacked on five more runs in the third inning, started off by Emily Robustelli's two-RBI triple to straightaway center. K.C. Budrewicz followed with a gritty at-bat in which she fouled off six pitches before reaching on an error by the Catamount shortstop. Her perseverance paid off, as she drove in a run on the play, and kept the inning

Celtics, Lakers ready to renew 80's rivalry

Inside the NBA with Glen Straub

Ah, the eighties. Who can forget such a ridiculous time period? Big hair, cut jeans, bright-colored shirts, Kevin Bacon and Culture Club are just some of the products from a decade that will never be forgotten – no matter how hard people try.

However, there is one aspect of the eighties scene that some people hope to never forget. Those who are fans of basketball have one thought of the NBA in the eighties: the Los Angeles Lakers vs. the Boston Celtics.

The Boston Celtics-LA Lakers rivalry of the eighties was arguably one of the best and most intense in sports history. All of its elements made it perfect.

There were two teams from opposite coasts of the country. Boston – a rugged east-coast hard-working city and LA – the glitz and glam of America.

Each team had their own version of the best player to ever play the game of basketball. The Lakers had an abnormally tall point guard named Ervin "Magic" Johnson, and of course, the Celtics had the supposed "Great White Hope" – a hick from Indiana named Larry Bird.

And of course let's not forget the reason why there was such a deep-hatred for each other. The Celtics were always the beast of the East and the Lakers were always the best in the West, so someone had to be the best overall and it was always determined in the NBA Finals.

The Celtics and Lakers met three times in the championship series during the eighties. Boston won the first time in 1984, but LA stole the title away from them the following year and captured it again in 1987.

Now lets fast-fast forward to 2002. Is there a chance that the Lakers and Celtics will meet in the Finals once again? The answer to this question is yes.

This season the Celtics have turned a new leaf under new coach Jim O'Brien and will make the postseason. With stellar play from stars Antoine Walker and Paul Pierce, the "C's" will end the 2001-02 campaign with their first winning record in eight years.

With Milwaukee having a sub-par year, Allen Iverson's uncertain status due to injury and many questions surrounding surprising clubs like the New Jersey Nets and Detroit Pistons, the Celtics have just as much a shot to make the finals as any other team in the Eastern conference bracket.

The Lakers have been and always will be the favorite to make the Finals as long as Kobe Bryant and Shaquille O'Neal are both healthy and playing. Shaq has a nagging toe injury going into the playoffs, but with both of them on the floor it is going to be tough to defend and beat the potential dynasty.

A personal goodbye to Eve.

Last night loyal fans at Madison Square Garden in New York City watched their lowly New York Knicks play the talented Orlando Magic with the thought in mind that for the first time in fifteen years, the Knicks will not be making the postseason. It was just another meaningless game in the depressing concluding days of the season for Knicks fans everywhere.

However, there was a lot more meaning to the game then most people might think. This season, all-time Knicks leading scorer, Patrick Ewing, has roamed the bench for the Tracy McGrady-led Magic. It seems like only yesterday when Ewing was the workhorse and the outright leader of the Knicks. In the Magic's last game, just four months shy of his 40th birthday, Ewing received his first career "Did-Not-Play-Coaches Decision." His aging body has finally reached its max. Many people believe – including his head coach and former teammate Doc Rivers – that Ewing will retire after the season.

If he does retire, last night was the final time he will ever play on the MSG floor. Patrick may have let down the New York faithful a number of times when he missed lay-ups and foul shots in the clutch en route to capturing that all-elusive championship, but without him fans in New York wouldn't be in such a state of disbelief now that their team is not making the postseason.

Lipstadt to give talk on Holocaust

By Jake Lilien
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The final event held on the University of Massachusetts campus in honor of Holocaust Memorial Week will take place tonight, when author Deborah Lipstadt delivers a lecture, "The Holocaust On Trial," at 7:30 p.m. in Mahar Auditorium.

Lipstadt, a noted historian, will discuss the challenge she was presented with when forced to prove the existence of the Holocaust in a trial. Lipstadt had been sued for libel by British author David Irving, whose work she had criticized, and was required by British law to prove that Irving's assertions [such as his claim that Hitler was unaware of the murder of Jews in concentration camps, and that no full-scale attempts to commit genocide were made] were incorrect.

Larry Goldbaum, director of the UMass Office of Jewish Affairs, considers Lipstadt's academic work to be crucial to efforts to debunk the claims of Holocaust deniers.

"Professor Lipstadt's scholarship on the Holocaust denial movement is important, and for her, very dangerous, as Irving's libel suit shows all too well," he said. He went on to call Irving's writings "pseudo-scholarship."

"[His] lawsuit against Ms. Lipstadt threatened to silence those who would speak the truth in the face of such distortions," he continued. "Fortunately, and not surprisingly, the judge found Irving to be a Holocaust denier, a falsifier of history, a racist, and an anti-Semite."

The lawsuit originated when Lipstadt attempted to refute Irving's claims about Hitler in her book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory. In the book, Lipstadt accused Irving of being a "Hitler partisan," dedicated to improving the German dictator's reputation.

"Familiar with historical evidence," she wrote, "he bends it until it conforms with his ideological leanings and political agenda."

In particular, Lipstadt took offense to Irving's assertion that Hitler was innocent in the murder of six million Jews. Irving responded with a libel suit, claiming that Lipstadt had unfairly smeared him and his work. Under British libel laws, Lipstadt was forced to prove that her condemnation of his work was fair, and thus, to prove that the Holocaust had indeed occurred as a result of Hitler's orders.

Lipstadt's legal efforts focused on the testimony of eyewitnesses, both Jewish and Nazi. Irving insisted that all of the witnesses in question were lying.

At the conclusion of the trial, the judge found that Lipstadt's assertions had been correct, and that Irving's work held little academic merit.

The judge stated in his ruling that Irving "associated with right-wing extremists who promoted neo-Nazism," and had "portrayed Hitler in an unwarrantedly favourable light, principally in relation to his attitude towards and responsibility for the treatment of the Jews."

The judgment was lauded internationally by Jewish leaders, and by the international media. Despite the refutation of Irving's claims, however, the Holocaust denial movement continues.

New chancellor selected

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Dr. John V. Lombardi has been named as the new chancellor for Amherst campus of the University of Massachusetts.

University President William M. Bulger announced the appointment of Dr. Lombardi, formerly the president at the University of Florida, to the position currently held by interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams. Williams has been serving in an interim role since David K. Scott resigned in 2001.

"John Lombardi has demonstrated that he has the capacity to inspire greatness. I am confident that he will lead UMass-Amherst to new heights," President Bulger said in a released statement.

Lombardi's appointment now moves on to the Board of Trustees for approval.

"President Bulger honors me with his recommendation to the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees," Lombardi said in a released statement. "It will be a great privilege to have the opportunity to work with the faculty, students, staff, alumni and friends of the University of Massachusetts-Amherst."

Lombardi beat out two other candidates for the position. The Board of Trustee's search committee selected Elizabeth D. Capaldi, provost at the State University of New York at Buffalo, and William E. Hogan II, a member of the University of Minnesota Board of Regents as finalists.

"It was our good fortune to have three distinguished academic leaders as finalists. Each candidate presented distinctive strengths and each could provide outstanding leadership," Bulger said. "Under John Lombardi's stewardship, the University of Florida ascended to new heights. I believe that John Lombardi's record of accomplishment cannot be overlooked and makes him the candidate best suited to lead our flagship campus."

However, he doesn't arrive without controversy. Despite a verbal commitment to diversity at UF, Lombardi once called his boss "an Oreo, black on the outside and white on the inside." Although he kept his job, he took heavy criticism for the comment.

The committee looked at over 100 applications. The Boston firm of Isaacson Miller helped with the search.

COURTESY THE WORLD WIDE WEB

Former University of Florida president John V. Lombardi has been selected as the new chancellor by President Bulger.

"[The firm provided] the University with diligent and skilled assistance throughout this very important process," Bulger said.

Music and Dance Professor Ernest May, the secretary of the Faculty Senate, is pleased with the decision to hire Lombardi.

"I applaud the appointment of John Lombardi as Chancellor, and the Faculty Senate looks forward to working collaboratively with him on the challenges and opportunities for transformation which face the flagship campus," May said in a released statement. "He has a charismatic personality and long experience as a crusader and a fundraiser. He is a national expert – perhaps the national expert – in studying the profile and characteristics of the nation's top research universities. The University of Massachusetts is lucky to get him."

Lombardi served as president of the University of Florida for nine years before stepping down. He is a historian of Latin America, and has served on the American Association of Universities, the American Council on Education and the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges. He has authored papers on American research universities and statewide governance. Lombardi has authored nine books, mostly on the history of Venezuela, his area of expertise.

"John Lombardi is equal parts visionary and skillful, exacting manager, and we consider ourselves fortunate to find a chancellor with these attributes," said Grace K. Fey, the chair of the Board of Trustees and the search committee. "Dr. Lombardi's decade at the University of Florida truly was a period of innovation and accomplishment. We are pleased to welcome him to the University of Massachusetts."

Lombardi is credited with advancing the University of Florida by increasing enrollment and fundraising from public and private sources.

"Working together, we can enhance Amherst's tradition of competitive excellence — always the hallmark of America's major research universities," Dr. Lombardi said.

Lombardi received a Bachelor of Arts degree from Pomona College in 1963, and briefly attended the University of California at Los Angeles. He got a master's degree from Columbia in 1964 and a doctorate there in 1968. From Los Angeles, Lombardi is 60, married, and has two children.

President Bulger thanked Williams for her service to the University as interim chancellor.

"Chancellor Williams provided inspired leadership during her year in office. Marcie Williams helped to calm and heal the campus after the outrage of September 11, and she has made difficult decisions during a time of fiscal challenge," Bulger said. "She has touched the hearts and minds of many of our students. We are in her debt."

SGA enraged by new policy banning music after 11 p.m.

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst administration implemented a new policy yesterday stating that all amplified music will be turned off by 11 p.m. during all residential spring programming events.

Outraged members of the Student Government Association Senate met last night to discuss the University's decision. Members discussed the severity of the situation in specific relations to Southwest Week and Orchard Hill's Bowl Weekend.

"This is bull-shit, and we're getting screwed over once again by the administration," Speaker Aaron Saunders said. "I met with Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos and other administrators and they told me about their new policy of cutting off all music at 11 p.m. for all spring events," Saunders said. "They said that they have an ordinance from the city of Amherst. I was told we (the University) need to be good neighbors, but there will be music after 11 p.m."

Saunders further explained that the University had crossed a line by implementing a new policy, and more specifically by not conversing with students and the SGA before doing so.

"There is a line that the administration doesn't usually cross and they crossed it," Saunders said. "Quiet hours don't even begin until midnight on the weekends, and now the University is going to be faced with 5,000 students looking for something to do when they get cut off after just getting into the night."

Issues surrounding concerns of last year's Southwest Week were also stated by the administration and brought before the Senate.

"This is coming out of left field because there were no real problems last year," Kerry Mulcahy, SCERA Director and former Governor of Southwest said. "Seven thousand students showed up to Dispatch last year, and know one from the Campus Activities Office showed up, and we only had hired two police officers. We called them the next day requesting more, and they didn't send any."

Mulcahy further explained that she felt the recent decision to be impulsive and unfair to the student body.

"I feel at this point it would be so rude to implement this policy, because no one is aware of it," Mulcahy said. "This is the one good thing we have going for us right now and people have been working so hard to make these events possible for the students."

Questions also arose about whether or not the planned spring musical events will take place due to the new policy.

"They're letting everyone plan things, but they'll probably pull something out of their ass at the last minute," Mulcahy said.

Further issues kept members of the SGA also busy, one being the administration's recent decision to not allow candles in dorm rooms this coming fall in a response to taking fire safety more seriously.

"The administrations new way with cracking down on fire hazards is to eliminate candles," Saunders said. "The administration is trying to play mommy and daddy, and most of us are over 18 and I think we're responsibly enough to have candles in our rooms. Their job is to make sure that the fire alarms work and that we will be safe, not take on the job of our parents."

Senate members also discussed issues surrounding the new alcohol policy by presenting a motion stating that a student cannot be penalized for having an empty container of alcohol in their room.

"We're doing Javier Cevallos a favor by passing this motion, we're saving him time and paper work for the future," Senator Dan Saunders said.

The Senate passed the motion unanimously.

"This is one of those gray areas in the new alcohol policy that needed to be addressed," Saunders said. "It needed to be stated explicitly that having empty containers is not a violation of the alcohol policy."

Fac Senate to hear special reports

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Faculty Senate will hear special reports this afternoon from both the Status of Women Council and the Academic Matters Council. In addition they will discuss the motion by the Rules Committee for the Faculty Senate to endorse the Save UMass rally in Boston on April 25.

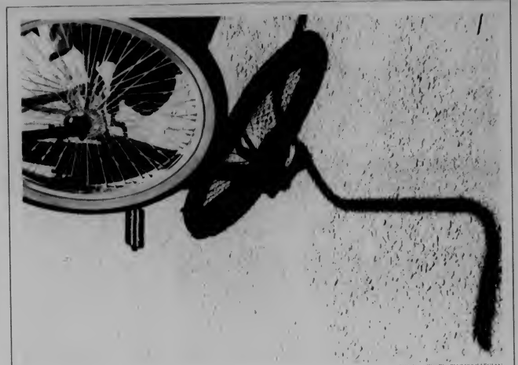
The Status of Women council's report concerns the University of Massachusetts decision to eliminate the childcare center. The council views the center as detrimental to the well being of women at the University.

"The message the administration is sending is that women's scholarship, leadership, and work is not valued at UMass and is irrelevant to the mission of the University," the report stated.

It remains unclear as to whether the Council's report will change due to the University's decision Monday to extend the child care center through the upcoming year.

Following the Status of Women Council's report the Senate will hear from a report from the Academic Matters, Academic Priorities and Program and Budget Councils concerning their proposal to create a minor in Engineering Management.

The Engineering Management minor would be the first minor offered in engineering by the University and would be a joint enterprise of the Schools of Engineering and Management. The report justifies the need for the minor by saying that it was a goal of the Isenberg Endowment to the School of Management to "develop closer cooperation between business, engineering and sciences," adding that the collaboration between the two schools is "consistent with the goals of the Amherst campus in fostering interdisciplinary programs."



The minor would be funded entirely through the two schools. For the first year course related costs would be covered by the School or Engineering. Initially the number of students in the program would be limited to five students per year with a predicted eventual program size being fifteen students a year.

The report states that the Academic Priorities Council fully supports the establishment of the minor and asks that the Faculty Senate move to approve the minor. The School of Engineering and the School of Management view the minor as an integration of departments without interference to any of their other major's ability to enroll in courses.

"Since the program is intended only for engineering students taking courses in the SOM, it will be straightforward to implement. It will serve those students well. There will be no impact on enrollments elsewhere in the University," states the report.

After approving or rejecting the new Engineering Management minor the Faculty Senate will hear from the Rules Committee on why the Senate should support the Save UMass coalition's rally at the State House in Boston on April 25. The Rules Committee is asking that the Senate urge faculty to attend the rally and allow their students to do the same.

The Faculty Senate will meet in Herter Hall 227 at 3:30 pm.

Magona discusses Apartheid

By Jake Lilien
COLLEGIAN STAFF

South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission [TRC], which granted amnesty to those who confessed to committing political crimes under the Apartheid regime, has been internationally praised South African blacks and whites view of the Commission as a positive way to get past the horrors of the nation's dictatorial past.

Writer Sindiwe Magona, a black woman raised in the Transkei region of South Africa, agrees with the TRC's basic tenets. Yet she objects to current perceptions that, in light of the end of Apartheid and the freedom of political prisoners, the racial oppression seen in her home country has ended.

Last night, Magona delivered a lecture at the Conte Polymer Research Center, titled, "South Africa Now: What the Truth and Reconciliation Commission Left Out." Magona argued that while the end of Apartheid was "a miracle," more work needs to be done.

Magona began her lecture by saying that while she did not agree entirely with the actions of the TRC, she was glad to see that the work of the Commission was carried out.

"The Truth and Reconciliation Commission made it impossible for any South African to deny that great evil had ever taken place in that country," she said.

"My quarrel with the TRC is that not all of the things that were done to people were addressed," she continued. "Only the 'gross violations of human rights' were addressed. They were only looking at people who had been tortured and died, were maimed, or disappeared.

"But what about the rest of us?" she asked. "We all suffered!"

Magona stated that her intention was not to downplay the importance of the end of Apartheid.

"The miracle happened," she said. "But the question is, are we now home as a nation, safe and dry? Is South Africa a place where we can rest, say that democracy has been achieved, and dismantle all of the structures designed...to help people who were oppressed? My answer is no."

Magona stated that a black South African whose education under the Apartheid era had ended at the second grade would be unable to secure an adequate lifestyle, regardless of the political system in place. She also pointed to the epidemic of crime seen in the country, and made a connection between the crime rate and the suffering caused by racism.

"You can not have an abomination [like Apartheid] and not attribute it to some sort of psyche damage somewhere along the line," she said.

She suggested that black South Africans would be well served by improved educational programs, and criticized the lack of reforms seen in education.

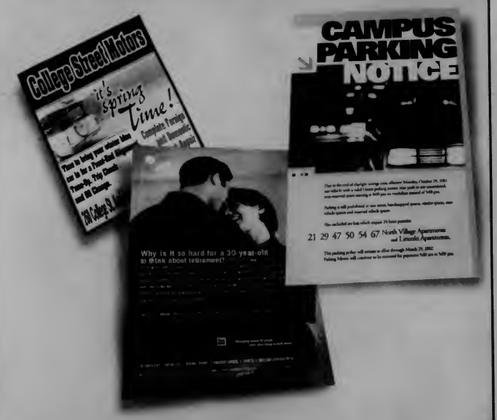
"You go to former white schools and former black schools, and see if you see a transformation," Magona said.

She also expressed support for financial reparations for the victims of Apartheid, and complained that the current figure being considered by the government for reparations [roughly $1500 per victim] was too low.

She concluded her lecture by saying that the 8-year old democratic system present in South Africa could not survive on its own.

"A new democracy is like a newborn baby," Magona said. "It takes a lot of people, and a lot of concentration, to help keep a democracy on track. You cannot have a democracy if you are not vigilant."

At the conclusion of the lecture, members of the audience were encouraged to ask questions or give comments. Frederick Tillis, Director Emeritus of the Fine Arts Center, and a former UMass Music Professor, suggested that while reparations may not be possible, the nation might benefit from a program similar to America's Head Start.



"I applaud colleges who do that," Magona said in response. "But at that point it's too late! We have to start with the little ones."

Israel - Palestine
other schools react

(We are running this column as an example of how other schools across the nation are discussing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, a topic at the forefront of discussion here at the University of Massachusetts.)

(U-WIRE) PITTSBURGH - A year ago the Palestinian-Israeli conflict didn't register on the radar of most college students. Though most knew it was a place of near-constant violence, the Middle East seemed distant, with little relevance to students' lives. For many, being pro-Israeli was just status quo.

In recent weeks, as violence escalated, pro-Palestinian groups have become more visible on campuses nationwide. With an emotional campaign presenting the Palestinians as an oppressed people, these groups have garnered support from various liberal and leftist factions, such as living wage and affirmative action supporters.

Friday afternoon's pro-Palestinian rally on the front lawn of the William Pitt Union demonstrated that the pro-Israeli status quo would no longer go unquestioned at the University of Pittsburgh.

With signs equating Israeli tactics to those of the Nazis, some emblazoned with swastikas, protesters took up the pro-Palestinian position and created quite a stir. On-lookers, both Jewish and non-Jewish, were confused and angered by the rally. The choice of day – the Friday before Holocaust Remembrance Day – and the use of the swastika demonstrated a lack of sensitivity on the part of the protesters and caused some to interpret the rally as not only pro-Palestinian, but anti-Semitic.

Rallies, regardless of which position they support, must serve to educate. Considering the general and continued lack of knowledge about the history and complexities of the conflict, protesters should strive to do more than shock their viewers with historically anti-Semitic symbols. In order to support a cause, the populace must understand it.

Furthermore, in utilizing their right to express themselves, activists must clearly define their positions and goals. Factions within the Palestinians and Israelis have differing positions, and terms such as occupation and terrorism have different meanings to different factions. Neither side can afford to throw terms around, because even those familiar with conflict are confused when terms go undefined.

Signs must clearly represent the opinions of those holding them. Lack of clarity in these cases is easily construed as hateful. Case in point: the use of swastikas. Construed by some to equate the military occupation of Palestinian lands with Nazi tactics, others construed them as anti-Semitic.

The conflict carries high stakes both intellectually and emotionally. Many nationwide have family on both sides and the practitioners of three of the world's major religions consider the region to be the holy land. As tensions continue to rise and violence escalates, the conflict will be an increasingly pervasive issue on campuses across the country. As students must take the opportunity to educate themselves on the issues, protesters must facilitate this while keeping sensitivity in mind and clearly stating their positions.

RA union takes the low road

Are these people getting bad advice, or are they simply stupid?

I'm talking about the RA union, which made some news earlier this week by occupying some University offices for short periods of time. This was done to protest the University's decision late last month not to bargain with the organization even though the Labor Relations Board had ratified the election in which the RAs voted overwhelmingly to unionize. UMass' position was that the board had made a mistake in interpreting the laws regarding unionization. This meant they weren't going to deal with the union until everything got straightened out, probably by going to court.

So, basically, the RAs won fair and square and UMass didn't like it, so they figured they'd just ignore the union until they could figure out a way to make it go away.

So far, so good for the union, I'd say. It would require a complete ignorance of American history to think that an employer hostile to organized labor would just roll over and embrace a new union after one setback, however large. They still had the upper hand in the struggle, what with the elections, the ratification by the Labor Board and all the press across the country backing them up. If they were right, UMass could stall all it wanted, but the victory would still eventually go to the RAs.

Then, on Monday, the organized dorm peace-keepers went and did quite possibly the stupidest thing they could possibly have done.

In quick succession, the offices of the Chancellor, the UMass News Office, Director of Housing Services Michael Gilbert and Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos were occupied by protesting union members. They did the typical cliché protest stuff – chanting, holding signs, etc. – and after a while they were chased from each location by the threat of cops or by cops themselves.

And, in doing so, they completely lost the high ground in their struggle.

You see, I never liked the idea of the RA union. I was in a union for years (United Food and Commercial Workers) and I was an RA for a while, and I really don't think the one has much to do with the other. Still, despite my opposition to the RA union, I had to hand it to them. They had won the fight fair and square. They stuck with their guns and got UMass right where they wanted them, holding on to the position of the underdog idealists the entire time. It was grudging, but they'd earned my respect.

So it blew my mind when I heard that they had gone and pulled a stunt like this. It really takes effort to make UMass look good these days, but these guys and gals pulled it off.

You see, the RAs' point was that UMass was breaking the law by not bargaining with them after they'd been ratified, and that UMass was playing the union-buster by trying to appeal the decision. These occupations were their response.

Stupidity.

They accused UMass of breaking the law, and, because that's a terrible terrible thing, they could only respond by breaking the law. They say that UMass is playing dirty, so they gangbang administrators in their offices. Where's the logic?

Pat Colvario, a union RA, was quoted in Tuesday's Collegian as saying "We've done everything legal up to this point."

My question is, what changed your mind? As far as I can see, playing by the rules had gotten the union pretty damn far, into territory that no one had charted before. And now you're just whiny bitches who think that harassment will get you what you want. You copped your enemy's tactics, only on a more extreme level, and got covered in the same mud.

> "They say that UMass is playing dirty, so they gangbang administrators in their offices. Where's the logic?"

UMass will take the union to court and stall as much as possible; chalk that up to entirely understandable (and anticipated) reality. I don't think that's such a horror; it certainly doesn't make Javier Cevallos some Pinkerton thug with a tommy gun executing hapless union heroes left and right. If the union is legal and legit, as thus far the courts have deemed it to be, than after all the proceedings are over with that fact will stand, and UMass will be out of options.

That isn't good enough, though. I sense some de-operation; some of the union pioneers are seniors and juniors, and they don't want victory in the future, they want it now, goddamn it. I can understand that: it must be immeasurably frustrating to have worked so hard and gotten so close but not be able to see the final victory in your time here.

These tactics, though, are just discrediting the union and making it's cause a joke. If the organizers of the union are serious about their goals and not out for personal glory and gratification, they'll think twice before doing something so asinine and ineffective as occupying University offices to try and get what they want.

You've already needlessly tainted your image. Smarten up or get some better advice.

Holding journalism accountable
Cashing in can't be first media priority

"Today, the business of news is business – not news."

A simple but disheartening idea, preached to journalism students nationwide and, most recently, the focal point of a speech delivered by Geneva Overholser here at UMass.

Addressing the gathered crowd at Memorial Hall on Monday, Overholser, former ombudsman and current columnist at The Washington Post, detailed what journalists and students alike have been wary of for some time; that the almighty dollar reigns supreme in the news business, and that the founding objectives of the business – to report objectively and service the readers with facts and integrity – have largely been lost as corporations continue their rapid ascent into the symbolic drivers seat. As Overholser was quick to point out time and again, the grip on that seat is tightening.

"The emphasis has shifted," she said, "from providing readers with information to providing stockholders with a healthy return."

For those of us with a passion for the news, it's a difficult truth to swallow. Media outlets are more likely to pitch their profitability to Wall Street than non-media corporations. Objectivity is being distorted when conglomerates blanket themselves across several markets at once, virtually ensuring unbalanced and biased coverage in their favor. The trend continues unchallenged and journalism sinks deeper into peril, as Overholser says, because we're not provoked to act on it. We sit and accept the enormous shifts in power, not realizing the implications of these movements until we're dramatically and tragically called to arms.

> "This… is another simple truth: the public (you, me, everyone) must demand a change, a return to legitimate journalism, to a code of reporting that has genuine value and relevance in our everyday lives."

On 9/11 of last year, this nation's physical and emotional makeup was altered significantly. While it would be entirely inappropriate to implicate the media in these attacks, we can hold it responsible for the little we knew on Sept. 10, as well as the weeks, months and years before. As Overholser says, "On Sept. 11, you would have been caught less off guard had the press been doing a better job before…our questions would have been different. The foreign press is in decline."

A large contributor to that downward spiral, then, is the prioritization of cash over content by these big-league owners. What interest do they have in comprehensive coverage, in closely following situations in Afghanistan or Palestine when the advertisers are already calling? What would motivate them to alter a product that's selling? Therein lies a root of the problem, as Overholser acknowledges as well; "there's a difference between information and good journalism"; our true and most realistic potential remains in the printed medium. We have to believe, as Overholser does, "that businesses are not so beyond the reach of social concern." We must believe that there are in fact outstanding publications out there, and that the others are capable of following their lead in maintaining both financial success and journalistic integrity.

The New York Times demonstrated the potential for that on Monday, taking seven Pulitzer prizes largely due to its coverage of a post – 9/11 New York City. It achieved – or, at the very least, got us back in the mindset – of journalism as a public service. Not that such services should be recognized solely by way of awards, but it served a symbolic point: this was good. Now keep it up.

Like any worthy cause, it starts individually. As Overholser began on Monday afternoon, "Newspapers are what I know and care most about."

Newspapers are what I care about and hope to learn more about. To make a life out of. They – as well as the news itself – should remain a priority in your eyes as well.

On trying to defy age

As a little girl, I used to wish that my small hands had the power to smooth out the wrinkles on my mother's face. The webs of tiny, twisted lines, encircling her bright green eyes, haunted me. I could sense their unyielding power. There was no cream or powder that I could buy, with my occasional $5 reward for raking Mr. Abrahamson's yard or watching Mr. Porta's poodle while he was on vacation, to take them away.

As I grew older, and entered elementary school, I would sit with my grandmother some evenings when she was alone and read to her. A long withering rose, she sat by the window, beckoning the pale moonlight to dance upon her face. Her once resilient, bobbing curls of auburn had since surrendered to the discoloration of time. Cheeks that once felt the warmth of rugged whiskers brushing upon them now felt the sting of missed oatmeal and spilled tea, courtesy of shaky hands.

Beginning in early childhood, I (like most other girls) received messages from our society. First, and most obvious, the message that women are viewed in our world as objects of beauty. Second, and more important, that in our ageless society there is a great value placed on youthfulness, especially for women. Whereas men are often noted as 'distinguished-looking' as they get older, women gradually lose value in the eyes of society. Consequently, many women look to plastic surgery as a means of defying nature: face-lifts, eyelid surgery, skin resurfacing, forehead lifts, as well as facial implants (cheek, chin and lip implants).

Hilda Doolittle's famous poem, "Helen in Egypt," presents the ideology that the most ideal, feminine woman is the one that does not change. Perhaps this is why 1930s sex goddess, Marilyn Monroe, stands as the most mythologized figure in Hollywood history.

Four decades after her death, she remains as the thirty-six year old voluptuous beauty with the generous pout, in the minds of many. Forever young and beautiful, Marilyn proves frozen in image, unchanging. Indeed, this 'original blonde bombshell' fits Doolittle's design of the model woman.

Only recently, however, have such forensic artists like Michael Streed been able to peer into the lost futures of such ageless celebrities like Monroe. Streed's sophisticated computer technique known as 'age progression' was originally developed in the early 1990s to help find missing children. The highly specialized technique, a blend of art and computer science, also takes family history, personality, and lifestyle into account.

Featured on an ABC news program in late March, Streed is stirring the curiosity of others. What would Marilyn Monroe or, say, Princess Diana look like at an older age? "Age progression" has determined that Marilyn would have developed fatty deposits around her eyes and a softer jaw line. In addition, Streed reports that "her chin and lips would have lost definition and gravity would have taken its toll, as well as years of smiling and squinting".

So what does this prove? Marilyn Monroe would have eventually gone through the same aging process that every other woman in the world faces. Perhaps such harsh realities for an aged Marilyn deserve different treatment, only because Marilyn is such a mythologized figure in our society. Though her spectacular rise through the ranks of silver screen guaranteed her a place among Hollywood's legends, we cannot forget that Marilyn was (first and foremost) Norma Jean Mortenson. A sex goddess, perhaps – but nevertheless, a mortal one.

The Irish modernist poet, Mary O'Neill Davenport, once wrote:

"You made beauty long ago;
But unceasing waters flow.
And great unattending waves carry all things that we know.
And they wither and grow old."

Only in time was I able to regard my mother's wrinkles as a celebration of smiles and laughter. Only in time would I find authentic beauty in her markings of a happy life. So too, with my grandmother, I was, alas, able to look upon the aging process as a natural part of life. Growing old is, indeed, one of life's few certainities. One better off being embraced gracefully, rather than resisted.

An intro to tarot through reading

By Shauna Billings
VIRGO VIXEN

When I first came to UMass, I embarrassingly introduced myself as, "Hi! I'm Shauna! I'm from Salem, you know, the witch place…but I'm not one." (Nerves will do that to you, but oh lord, the things you would change if you could.) I may not be Wiccan, but after years of working at such spots as "The Witch Village," I have picked up some rather interesting skills. Yes, how cliche – I'm from Salem, I live on Gallows Hill, I read tarot cards.

As exciting as a history and how-to of tarot might be (Yawn! What?), I opted instead to diagram a reading for you. So, I gave a traditional tarot card reading (of the Celtic cross spread variety) to a senior Communication major "Bob." The Celtic cross spread (depending on who reads for you) contains 10 cards, upon which additional cards were added to expand upon the issues. Everything that follows came up in the cards – with no prior knowledge of Bob's history.

The central issue of Bob's reading is that he has a lack of faith in his own abilities. This lack of self-assurance is holding him back from getting what he wants in life. But if he conquers this low self-esteem, all his wishes will come true.

In his past, the Bobster was lacking love relationships. With each year that passed, he had expected his predicament to change, but it didn't. But in his near future, he will suddenly find true love.

Currently, Bob feels out of the loop with his circle of friends, due to the fact that they all have girlfriends. He is also out of the loops however, because he cuts himself off, by being too into his own world. The love that is going to suddenly arrive will rev up his social life again.

However, in the near future, he will need to make a decision between the love of his life and the creative opportunity of a lifetime. If he chooses the right path for him, it will lead to all his dreams coming true.

Bob ends up in the creative job of his dreams, which will lead to all the money that he needs in life. He will never return to college for graduate school, as the career that he ends up in requires no higher degree.

Later on in his professional career, a trusted partner will try to "screw" him out of a large sum of money.

He will marry the love of his life, a girl with dark brown hair and dark eyes with a strong personality and a survivor spirit. Together they will have two children.

Bob then responded to his reading.

"Wow," said Bob. "The reading was about 95 percent accurate. Specifically the cards that related to my past and my present. The cards that said as I matured I constantly expected each new step in my life resulting

What's your sign?

By Elena Panesis
COLLEGIAN TAURUS

Hey baby, what's your sign? Gemini, Scorpio, Aquarius…. Sure, you've heard all the names before, but it's so hard to keep them straight! Since I am a pretty stellar gal, I have always been fascinated by astrology and know a few essentials about each of the 12 signs. It comes in handy at bars when people often flash their license pictures complete with vital stats including date of birth. You see April 11, 1981 and shout happy 21st birthday and buy the gorgeous guy a shot. Of course, I do the same, but I also astrologically chart the birthday boy as Aries the Ram (March 21-April 19), one of the three fire signs, which also includes Leo (July 23-August 22) and Sagittarius (November 22-December 21).

In fact, each of the 12 zodiac sign falls under one of the four elements- earth, water, wind and fire. This helps simplify astrology and will also make you sound all hip and new age at parties. For example, try making comments like "Pisces! That's a water sign. Oh, you must be a sensitive one." Knowing the four elements will also help you dudes score the ladies who love a man that's attuned with nature.

So let's go back to the three fire signs (see if you can remember them without looking back) and fill in the blanks. Fire signs are intense, bright take-charge individuals that enjoy leadership and other positions of power and authority. They are usually in-your-face and rarely restrained, as they will always fight to get their way! They do not have time for heavy emotions (get out of here Cancer, you crab!) and are not the type to be very soothing or supportive. Rather, they are your politicians, as many world leaders ally with a fire sign.

Fire signs are often compatible with air signs: Gemini (May 21- June 21), Libra (September 23- October 22) and Aquarius (January 20- February 18). These are the chatterboxes and writers of the zodiac (I wonder how many of the Collegian crew fits into this element?) who are never at a loss for words. They are very adaptable and always changing depending on the social setting. Often, this airy trio is the life of the party, but don't expect to get into a

Fate meets salvation

By Shauna Billings
DESTINY DUCHESS

Are we, as human beings, ruled by our heads and our hearts, or is there some outside influence has control over our lives as well? There has always been a human fascination with fate – Scandinavian mythology has the Norns, Greek mythology holds the three fates or Moirai, Shakespeare's MacBeth has his future foreshown by witches while Romeo and Juliet are star-crossed lovers from the get-go. Even modern day Hollywood has a preoccupation with predestination in such movies as Serendipity and Only You.

It is human nature to look for an explanation of that which cannot be explained. Is fate merely a way for humans to have peace of mind? Or is it true?

"I like to think that my decisions actually matter, not that everything has already been decided for me," said senior Political Science major Benjamin Joseph. He feels that what others explain as fate or destiny are merely "luck or coincidence."

Mellisa Kozik, a junior Psychology major and believer in tarot cards, holds quite the opposite opinion.

"I absolutely believe in fate," Kozik said. "I feel that although we have some control over our lives there is a "path" for all of us. Sometimes you do something or a situation arises, and you really cannot explain why – that's fate. However, I believe we can consciously change our destiny, if need be."

For those who are skeptical it is easy to find holes in the psychic arts of tarot, runes, I-Ching, palmistry and astrology. Psychic "experts" like Miss Cleo or the Psychic Friends as well as movie and TV roles of freaky astrology-and-yoga-lovin' sidekicks have made belief in destiny an easily marked target.

Our society is often deemed left brained – obsessed with the scientific, the logical and the economic. Creativity and emotions come second – and if something cannot be explained or understood, it is typically discounted. But discomfort with the unexplainable psychic arts is not a recent phenomenon.

Tarot cards date back to 15th century, but were later banned by Catholicism and sects of Protestantism. Did these organized religions really feel that psychic powers were tied to the devil, or was it from fear that they forbade their practitioners from using tarot cards and practicing palmistry? Other religions embrace mysticism, such as heavy handed emotional discussion, as they are not ones for wearing hearts on their sleeves.

Like night and day between the fire and air, the water signs Cancer (June 22-July 22), Scorpio (October 23-November 21) and Pisces (February 19-March 20) are the emotional criers often with liquid tears that could fill rivers. Know someone that loves to talk endlessly about feelings, particularly yours? He or she is probably a water sign as these selfless folks often put other people first. Mike Delano, Arts Editor, is not only a Cancer but the most giving man in the world. (Hint, hint all you ladies!) An upside to the sign is its psychic ability, but its downfall is taking on too much emotional baggage, which can sometimes lead to addictions like drugs, alcohol or food, which allow them to cope with heavy feelings.

Our aquatic water friends love hanging with the trustworthy Earth signs: Taurus (April 20- May 20), Virgo (August 23- September 22) and Capricorn (December 22-January 19). Members of this stable, consistent element are the loyal, dependable people to call on when you need a job done right. They often serve others and do not care too much about praise or appearing in the spotlight. Yet, they can also be pretty stubborn and stuck in their ways (Taurus is often bull-headed) as they lack spontaneity and stick to mundane schedules. Yet, they are very practical and can be good companions for air signs that need a reality check and water signs provide them with comfort and ease their constant fears.

So read through the descriptions a few times and maybe do a little of your own research, keeping a critical mind (We all know astrology is far from being 100 percent accurate?!). Before you know it, you'll be the life of every party chattering away about your newly found knowledge so verbosely that others will swear you're an air sign!

Ozzy rules! Diary of a Madman on MTV

The Osbournes: MTV- Tuesday Nights at 10:30

"I love you, but you're all fking mad" - Ozzy Osbourne

Very few shows meet the rigid criteria for the "Tube Notes Seal of Approval. The new MTV series "The Osbournes" doesn't just meet it; it beats it. The show boasts it's "television's first reality sitcom," and it may also be television's funniest sitcom.

The format is simple: "Real World" style cameras all over the Los Angeles house of famous hard rocker Ozzy Osbourne that record the adventures of Ozzy and his family. While Ozzy is a wildly weird and entertaining character himself, the other three family members each provide their own touch of craziness to complement him. There is Ozzy's wife and manager Sharon, perhaps the voice of reason in the house, who proclaimed on a recent episode, "Martha Stewart can lick my scrotum. Do I have a scrotum?" There's his son Jack, a 16-year-old aspiring music kingpin and pothead. Then there is his daughter, 17-year-old Kelly, a typical rebellious teenager. Oh, and don't forget the family maid Melinda. Put them all together, and you've got The Brady Bunch and The Cosbys of the year 2002.

Besides the fact that Ozzy is totally hilarious in his ripe old age of 52, the show additionally has a great deal going for it. The storylines are more interesting and entertaining than most of what's on scripted sitcoms. Whether the constant feuding with the neighbors, Jack's wars with the Nanny, or the family cat with herpes (?!), there is always something upbeat and funny going on.

The most recent episode featured Ozzy's recuperation from a leg injury, which including him hobbling around the backyard in chase of the family cat. There is something particularly amusing about watching Ozzy chasing a cat, while swearing and calling it by the name of "Puss." Swearing, by the way, comes in high doses in the Osbourne family. The infamous F-word is used as a noun, verb, adjective, and even an adverb on a regular basis.

"The Osbournes" is perfect viewing for anybody looking for something different and amusing on television. Judging by the numbers, people are looking for just that, as "The Osbourne Show" has enjoyed ratings success since its debut. The show debuted at the beginning of March with a 2.8 rating (very respectable in the cable world), and has grown each week since. The past few episodes have even beaten MTV's usual most-watched program "The Real World," which "The Osbournes" follows on Tuesday nights. So it looks like we may be in store for a second season of "The Osbournes," if Ozzy makes it that long! Grade: A

Now What?: MTV- Saturday Nights at 9

If MTV got it right with "The Osbournes," they got it wrong, oh so wrong, with their new comedy "Now What?" As MTV.com describes the show, which debuted last Saturday night: "Follow the hilarious lives of four best buddies as they try to survive their junior year of high school. There's Zack, who's trying to win over his unrequited crush Lisa; Ted, the rich kid who can't score with his girlfriend Nancy; J.C., who gets hit on by women old enough to be his mother; and Gilby, the class clown who's always stirring up trouble."

Sounds innocent enough of a concept, but the execution on the debut episode, and I'd be willing to bet on future episodes, was poor. The first episode featured the un-creative storyline of a high school election in which Gilby runs for "dictator." The writing relies on "shock humor" which works best in an unrestrictive atmosphere like a movie, not in a censored one like on basic cable. There is a touch of intelligent satire in the humor, but that is bogged down by thinly defined and stereotypical characters. Mostly, the show seems to be trying "too hard" to be funny, with its 'joke every few seconds' format. It would be better served to take some time out, define some characters, and develop a coherent story. After that is done, the humor would be far more effective.

Character development is key to these television comedies. After all, if Kramer just crashed through the door in Jerry's apartment every week and we had no idea what the character was about, would it have been nearly as funny? Would Pheobe's airhead statements on "Friends" be as funny if the audience wasn't familiar with the nuances and personality of the character? No, of course not. This is why it is important for early episodes of these types of comedies to develop the characters, and this is one area where "Now What?" failed, based on its debut episode.

Side note on the show: what is with the way the character Gilby talks? There's a certain awkward subtle way that he pronounces words with "S" in them. Is that the way the actor talks, or was I all wrong about the show, and is this some kind of brilliant character development ploy?

While we will likely see a second season of Ozzy, another "Now What?" season is about as likely as the sky turning fuchsia. And I can't resist this joke: when "Now What?" is canceled, then what? Grade: C/D

TWEET
Southern Hummingbird
Goldmind/Elektra

Timbaland and Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott are among a crop of rapper/über-producers who are as well known for being talent scouts as they are individual recording forces to be reckoned with. They are highly sought out as producers for their distinctive style and have given birth to top-selling acts like Bubba Sparxxx and Aaliyah. In fact, 30-year-old R&B chanteuse Tweet may be their stab at finding another soulful diva a la the late, great Aaliyah. But here's an analogy for you: Tweet is to Aaliyah, as what New Coke was to classic Coke. Not a fitting replacement.

Tweet (nee Charlene Keys) was an old friend of Missy Elliott's when both were starting out in the music biz. While Elliott went on to unparalleled success, Tweet floundered in an unsuccessful girl group called Sugar. Eventually she found herself broke, lonely and without even one tiny album to her credit. The singer moved back in with her parents and began a serious contemplation of suicide that almost reached the brink until Elliott called with an offer. Tweet began to record for her friend and was soon awarded her own record deal.

With that back-story, one would think that Tweet's Southern Hummingbird would be more personal, more reflective of whom Tweet really is. No go. If you've heard one smooth singing R&B looker, you can pretty much tell what Tweet sounds like. There is nothing distinctive about Tweet's sound, and the album stumbles right out of the gate, never gaining its footing. There is little to grab one's attention on the album, just a tired soup of conventional R&B-princess prattle that gets stretched over the course of a wearying 17 tracks that last just over an hour. Tweet sings about loving men, losing men, cheating men, doing fine without men. That's all fine if you are a teenage girl, but Tweet is in her thirties. A few songs about a screwed-up love life is fine, but at that age there should be some serious thoughts beyond that (especially if your lyrics are the same as every other singer of your type out in record stores now).

A music critic could reasonably say that the production swamps Tweet's tissue-thin voice – if there was anything to swamp it with. Tim and Missy's production is surprisingly wan, lacking in the kind of sparkly futuristic gusto that they usually employ. Instead of the driving beats that were used on CDs like Aaliyah's self-titled last album, they utilize old school soul sounds that are reminiscent of 70s funk slow jams. That's all well and good on one song, or on many if some variation is used. But Tim and Missy fail to grasp the technique. I'm not the biggest fan of Marvin Gaye, but at least he didn't sound the same.

Tweet's first five or so tracks have little discernable differences between them, so they clump into one smeary mud ball of a song. It almost makes you thankful when the more upbeat "Boogie 2Night" hits your ears, until you realize that the song is a dreadfully bland dancehall number with underdeveloped and overused chunky beats. "Smoking Cigarettes" namedrops so many cigarette brand names; I thought I was listening to an advertisement for the cool menthol taste of Newport or whatever. Then she literally gets drunk, drowning her tears in alcohol, on the aptly titled "Drunk." Endorsing smoking and drinking, Tweet? What a great role model you are.

There are few moments when Southern Hummingbird crackles to life. One of those moments is on the sweltering hit single "Oops (Oh My!)," which is one of the few tracks that shows any kind of the promise that Missy Elliott must have seen in her new protégé. The song's jagged erotic groove more than makes up for the preciously coy lyrics about Tweet, uh, doing it for herself. (Many assumed – correctly – that the song has sexual undertones, even though the singer denied the rumors by saying it was about self-love. Yeah, Tweet, your explanation isn't helping you out any better.) The jutting, drum-driven beats carry Tweet's voice – in a rare smooth and purring manner – over a retro-futuristic twirl. Then the album gets back to business.

The songs revert back to the tofu-like soul of the first half. The only ballad, on an album that almost seems to consist of nothing but ballads, is "Complain," a tender, affecting bit of acoustic guitar soul that suggests the intersection of Alicia Keys, Michelle Branch, and Cindy Thompson. The two best tracks are actually hidden tracks that come at the end. "Sexual Healing (Oops Part 2)" is a more explicit take on the theme of "Oops (Oh My!)," with the trademark beats of Tim and Co. Tweet coos over tinkling bells, tribal drums and growling bass while a female rapper that sounds like Lil' Kim (I'm not quite sure if it is her, Missy or someone else – I can't find the credit). The hot "Big Spender" is not even a Tweet song, but solely a Missy Elliott limited edition track. The sloping beats loop and swirl around Elliott's bullet-blast rhymes, and the chorus is – get this – something straight out of a cabaret show. It is the only track on Southern Hummingbird that shows off the playfulness that Elliott is known for.

The much-hyped, much-buzzed about Tweet fails to live up to her advanced billing. She's got a great single out, a frail album and not much of a future as a "Direct Effect" star if she doesn't produce less gummy R&B in the next few years. Tweet is one southern hummingbird that doesn't fly.

in a new relationship – but then that relationship never materialized, were right on the money.

"The part about feeling out of the loop was rather eerie too," added Bob. "My roommates do all spend a lot of time with their girlfriends, and I have been rather involved in my own life and my future right now."

Bob was excited about the many mentions of a job in a creative industry as well – as he is interested in pursuing a job in directing or writing.

"I still can't believe how accurate the reading was on my past," said Bob. "And it makes me excited that things will work out in my future. But I'm a little worried, because I know that I'll be thinking about these things, and looking for a dark-haired girl."

For Bob, and for all those who are getting their tarot cards read – don't stress out about your reading. The tarot is a guide, but by changing one thing in your life, you could alter the path of your future. Your reading could be completely different the very next day. So don't stress out TOO much about that death card.

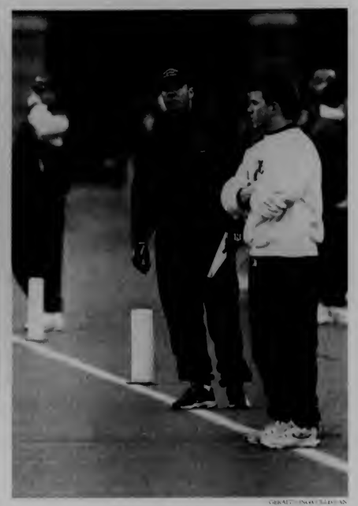
any of UMass' prior opponents, the Tigers are strong defensively and shoot the ball with great command.

"They're a very well coached team defensively," Cannella said. "They have tremendous shooters and shoot with great efficiency. They beat the defending National Champions, so I'm not going to compare them to anybody."



Coming off back-to-back losses to Duke (11-6) and Brown (9-8), the Bulldogs are led at attack by junior Mike Scaglione and sophomore Scott Kenworthy. Both have combined for 24 goals and 20 assists. The midfield is headed by senior Marko Lujic who has scored a team-high 15 goals for the Bulldogs. Missing, however, is injured star Brian Hunt. In 2001, Hunt led the team with 46 points and 31 goals, but Cannella doesn't think that his absence is necessarily a bad thing for Yale.

"Brian Hunt was their savior and I know it kind of doesn't make sense, but losing him kind of made them better," said Cannella, who mentioned that because of Hunt's loss, it forces Yale to move the ball around more.

Yale is ranked No. 14 in scoring this year with 11.6 goals a game. But UMass is ranked second nationally with 13.7 goals a game. It's that number which Eric Wenzel, the Bulldogs' goaltender, must have to cut into for his team to have a chance at victory. The junior has a 9.24 goals against average and a .500 save percentage.

Although this game isn't the most important one in UMass' near future, it still has some postseason implications. Because Yale beat Princeton, a Minutemen win over the Bulldogs should give UMass the upper hand over the Tigers come Selection Sunday, counting on the fact that Cornell beats Princeton and wins the Ivy League.

If Princeton wins the Ivy, however, the at-large bid will probably be taken away from the ECAC Cornell beat top-ranked Syracuse yesterday, 15-11, which gives it a good shot at making the 12-team field. Therefore, it looks like the Minutemen's April 20 date at Georgetown will be the clincher.

Men's basketball's Ronell Blizzard was one of 35 UMass athletes to be honored by the Athletic Council for their academic achievements.

GERALD TWOMEY/COLLEGIAN

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's Basketball

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Steve Lappas announced today that Jeff Viggiano, a 6-foot-6, 205-pound small forward from Suffield (Conn.) High School, has signed a National Letter of Intent to attend school here next season.

"We are looking forward to having Jeff in our program next year," Lappas said. "He has the ability to come in and give us some immediate help at the small forward position. He's a good scorer, who can really shoot the ball, and he's a good student. Jeff plays taller than he really is, and his abilities to slash and get to the basket should really help our team."

As a high school senior at Suffield High, Viggiano averaged 28 points, seven rebounds and four assists per game for coach Fran Aniello, and was named the Gatorade Player of the Year in the state of Connecticut. A good student, he has made the school's honor roll in each of the last six marking periods.

"I just figured with the distance from home and the high level of basketball (at UMass) that this was a good situation for me," Viggiano said. "My family and friends will be able to come up and watch me."

Viggiano will be one of seven players on the 2002-03 UMass roster that didn't play a game for the Minutemen this past season, however, two of those players were in the program and practiced with the team.

"I know there are a lot of new kids coming in so we'll be a pretty young team," Viggiano said. "It'll be good to have people to relate to. Hopefully, we can all be here four years and have a lot of success together."

The newest Minuteman holds Suffield High School records for points in a game (43) and career points (1,540). He played his AAU basketball with the Connecticut Gold.

"He's a slasher and a shooter," said coach Aniello. "He plays bigger than 6-6. He has long arms and can really jump. He's really a complete player."

With Viggiano's signature, Lappas and his staff have completed UMass' recruiting efforts for next season.

"I feel good about our recruits coming in and the players that will be returning," said Lappas. "If everyone continues to have a good attitude, work hard and improve, then we'll have a chance, because we've addressed some of our weaknesses with the new players. But, next year's team will still be very young."

Honor Roll

Thirty-five University of Massachusetts student-athletes were named to the Athletic Council Honor Roll for the 2001 Fall semester, 23 of whom earned a perfect 4.0 GPA for the semester. The student-athletes were recognized at the weekly UMass Sports Luncheon yesterday. The honor roll, which recognizes student-athletes with the highest GPA on each UMass team, included the following (Sport; Name; Class; Major).

Deborah Lipstadt

Holocaust on Trial

In 1977, the publication of Hitler's War by British historian David Irving caused a stir with its sweeping revisionist claims about the Holocaust. According to Irving, Hitler did not command the murder of millions of European Jews and was barely aware that the Holocaust had happened. American historian Deborah Lipstadt refuted Irving's claims in Denying the Holocaust. In 2000, Irving sued Lipstadt for libel in England, where there is no analog to the First Amendment. The burden of proof fell on Lipstadt. She won.

Minutemen pushing forward

With strong freshman class, UMass streaking

By Eric Soderstrom
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Do not question the confidence Greg Cannella has in his players, because it will not waver. And that goes for his freshmen, as well.

"They're playing for us, so you can't worry about them," said the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's head coach yesterday. "And with their experience, they're not really freshmen anymore."

He makes a good point. As the Minutemen (8-1, 3-0 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference), winners of eight straight, push forward in their quest for a bid to the NCAA Tournament, so mounts the playing level of the UMass frosh community.

Whether it is the faceoff specialties of Craig Conn, the shot-blocking brigade of Bill Schell, the assisting expertise of Gene Iundo, or the midfield maneuvering of Greg Scott and Matt Garcia, the Minutemen coaching staff says it has nothing to worry about.

"That's an added boost," said Cannella, whose team travels to New Haven, Conn., Saturday for a 1 p.m. meeting with Ivy League foe Yale. "When you have any contributions from freshman, it just takes some of the pressure off the other guys."

Conn has done a tremendous job in the faceoff circle lately for UMass. Winning 17-of-23 draws in the Minutemen's 18-7 victory over Maryland-Baltimore County, Conn worked his way to a second ECAC Lacrosse Rookie of the Week award. He has won 54-of-102 faceoffs this season.

Iundo has been extremely generous in the UMass attack since Cannella started him three games into the season at Navy. He has 14 assists in his seven starts, including three last week against UMBC and eight in the last three games. Five goals added to those helpers gives Iundo 19 points for the season.

After taking advantage of senior Rob Schneider's early tiltyness, Schell has been quite impressive between the pipes. Since his first start six games in against Albany, Schell has made four consecutive starts and has a 5.77 goal- against average and a .592 save percentage.

Garcia and Scott round out the talented bunch of Minuteman puddlers, both having made solid defensive contributions in the midfield as of late. It is Garcia who Cannella places on the opponent's best midfielder. And it is Scott – also a member of the Massachusetts football team – who Cannella forces upon the enemy's strongest middy.

"It's a good freshman class but only time will tell," Cannella said. "You can perform really well for a year and then tail off.

"But through the games we've played, every guy has really identified his role," he continued. "That is really important for moving forward and creating team chemistry."

And it's that solidarity which UMass needs in order to find success in the coming weeks. Three of the Minutemen's next four games are against top-notch teams.

It begins this weekend with Yale (4-3, 2-2 Ivy League), a team that always hovers in the nation's Top 20 and beat Princeton (15-13) earlier this year. Unlike

Matt Brady's

All-Time Team

Wagner's thunderous bat overshadowed silent persona

This is part two of a 10-part series portraying the 10 members of "Brady's All-Time Team" – a lineup consisting of the best Major League Baseball players ever.

"The only way to get it past him is to hit it eight feet over his head." John McGraw, in reference to Honus Wagner.

John Peter Wagner was born and raised in Western Pennsylvania, growing up in the small mining community of Mansfield. By the time he was in his thirties, Wagner was a hero nationwide, a prime example of a legend gaining fame in the backyard of his hometown.

Credentials (all-time rank): Original member of Hall of Fame; 1936; 722 stolen bases (10); 3415 hits (8); 252 triples (8); .327 career average (33); 1752 RBI (16) eight National League batting titles; hit .300 plus for 17 seasons; one of the best defensive shortstops ever.

The Argument: Alex Rodriguez has 243 home runs in just six full seasons, a .310 career average, and is one of the premier defensive players at his position. He has the speed, the glove, the swing and the savvy of someone who can easily be one of the greatest players in baseball history. But, he's still only six full seasons into his career, so I cannot logically justify putting him as top billing on the team.

However, there is no doubt in my mind that A-Rod will be the best player of our generation, not just at his position, but overall. He may have one of the best shots at breaking Aaron's home run record and doing it at the most highly skilled defensive position in the field.

Ernie Banks was a jox on the field, an amazing hitter, and a man who personified the Chicago Cubs for years. He is the only middle infielder, and only one of six infielders overall, to be a member of the 500 home run club. His love of the game likely has not been paralleled since he left the game. But a .274 batting average and a .329 on-base percentage are far too low to put him in a lineup of .300 hitters. His defense is strong, but not as strong as either Rodriguez or Wagner.

Ozzie Smith was by far the best defensive shortstop in the game, but his home runs were few and far between and his average is far from enough to make up for it. Still, he'd be a nice guy to have on the bench as a defensive replacement. Oh, and both Nomar Garciaparra and Derek Jeter will likely crack the top four within three or four more years.

What you didn't know: Judging by Wagner's personality and the amount of coverage that he has received in the years since his retirement, there is likely much that you do know about John Peter "Honus" Wagner.

For those of you who think that Cal Ripken was the first of the big defensive shortstops, he was preceded by about 80 years by a man named Wagner. A hulking immigrant's son, he stood only 5-feet-11-inches, but his bulky 200-pound frame made him a sight at the plate. He was also the first shortstop to hit cleanup for his team.

But his offensive ability was paralleled nicely by his defense. His long arms made it easy for him to scoop up ground balls, and he had impressive range for a big man. It was said that he threw to first so hard that small pebbles often arrived at first base along with the ball. It was also said that he was the best defensive player at any position aside from catcher or pitcher, and many times he was called on to play everywhere.

Once Wagner got to Pittsburgh, he never wanted to leave, being more than willing to take less money to play for his hometown team. He filled Forbes Field day in and day out, making the Pirates contenders for the pennant every year almost single-handedly.

Wagner's finest moment was the 1909 World Series, where the Pirates stood toe-to-toe with Ty Cobb's Detroit Tigers. Wagner completely outplayed Cobb in the series, hitting .333 to Cobb's .231, and stealing six bases to Cobb's two. But the famous incident came on a Cobb steal, where Cobb allegedly screamed, "I'm coming Krauthead," which Wagner combated by splitting Cobb's lip.

However, the report is generally regarded as erroneous, and both men had a great amount of respect for one another. They'll bat first and second for my team – two guys who will get on base for the order behind them.

MFA students promote creative writing in high schools

By Howard Weiss-Tisman
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

It is 7:45 a.m. on a cold Thursday as students shuffle into Barb Sussbauer's 12th grade classroom at Mohawk Trail Regional High School in Buckland. The young teacher grabs a pile of orange folders and distributes them as Brian Jordan, a graduate student in the University of Massachusetts master's of fine arts (MFA) program in creative writing, sits at the front of the class. Jordan breaks into a personal story about hiding places and talks about his sister who ate lunch in a bathroom stall in 10th grade to get away from bullies in the lunchroom.

"Write about your hiding place," he says. "Make it come alive."

The room goes silent.

Some students stare up at the ceiling, and others look down at the blank paper. Soon pens are scratching away.

Jordan is one of three writers from UMass working with students in Franklin County this semester to improve their writing skills and to inspire interest in literature. The Writers in Schools Project is part of a nation wide program that brings writers into K-12 classrooms to work with teachers to strengthen curriculum and encourage students' writing.

"This is a collaborative effort which acknowledges and promotes the sense that every student, every teacher, is a writer," said Noy Holland, assistant professor and director of the MFA program in English.

Once a week, a UMass graduate student visits one of three schools in the Mohawk Trail Regional School District. The poets and fiction writers collectively work with students in the classroom, as well as one-on-one.

Jordan is trying to help these young writers see that they have stories inside of themselves. He wants to show them that fiction is not something that happens outside, but instead comes from who they are.

"I'm trying to get them to understand that the birthplace of stories is the people, the emotions, the feeling, the memories," he said. "And they have it all inside of them."

Holland emphasized that an important part of the pro-

Hampshire Bird Club slide show addresses bird migration habits

Night migration common

By Jesse Greenspan
COLLEGIAN STAFF

During spring and fall migration, the majority of songbirds travel at night.

In order to track their progress, radar images and moonwatching are used to better understand their migration patterns.

Monday at the Immanuel Lutheran Church in Amherst, Andrew Farnsworth delivered a slide-show presentation to the Hampshire Bird Club on radar ornithology.

This Cornell graduate and current member of the National Audubon Society Science Fellow began his speech by going over certain migration patterns that have been detected by radar.

Apparently, bird density reaches its peak two to three hours after sunset, and the average bird migrates 1,500 feet above ground level. Peak calling time, on the other hand, occurs much closer to dawn, at a time when many birds are no longer in the sky.

"Some birds drop out – they only migrate for a few hours, and then they land," Farnsworth said. "It is not that they're tired; it's just their migration strategy.

"Many species vocalize in the morning presumably because they want to land together," he added. "There is safety in numbers."

Farnsworth began the slide show by saying there would be no actual pictures of birds. Instead, he used radar images and synoptic weather maps to forecast the next day's birding.

"A bird target, like anything else, shows up on radar," Farnsworth said.

A standard weather surveillance radar 88-D can sample a piece of sky, and can detect anything from raindrops to insects to birds. This is known as base reflectivity.

In order to tell the difference between raindrops, birds and insects, however, radial velocity and wind speeds are also calculated. Non-bird targets have a very specific velocity and image, while birds generally fly at a much faster rate than the wind and not always in the same direction.

Moonwatching is used to count the number of migrants flying across the full moon, and an average number of birds in the sky can be derived from comparing this to what is in the radar. On the very best nights (usually during the spring migration in May), up to 1,700 birds per cubic kilometer fly through the night sky.

However, one weakness to radar ornithology is that it is very difficult to identify individual birds.

"This is one of several drawbacks," Farnsworth said. "Not only is it difficult to tell whether you're talking about a flock of warblers or a Great Blue Heron, but by the same token, you can't do specific identification.

"The real value to [radar ornithology] is in answering more biological questions of migration as a whole, and in finding out what kinds of conditions precipitate large-scale migrations and what types of conditions stop migrations."

Still, despite its drawbacks, Farnsworth suggested that it was worthwhile to look at a radar image the night before bird watching. In order to see which areas have the highest concentrations of bird life, www.weathertap.com, www.weather.com and www.clemson.edu/birdrad are all reliable sites on the web.

In addition to its recreational purposes, though, radar ornithology also has a conservationist aspect to it.

"You can figure out what areas are important and where they are located," Farnsworth said. "That is going to be the biggest conservationist aspect to radar ornithology."

The migratory patterns of campus birds like the Blue Jay were discussed yesterday at the Hampshire Bird Club slide show.

Police alert: details armed robbery

The University of Massachusetts Police Department put out a public safety alert following an armed robbery that took place Tuesday.

The incident took place in Kennedy Dormitory at approximately 1:12 a.m. when two men entered a room with what seemed to be knives. The individuals allegedly stole a small amount of cash and left the room. No one was injured.

The two suspects were described as both being white men. The first was approximately 5-foot-10 to 6-foot in height with blond hair and a medium build. He was wearing a light blue hooded sweatshirt with a brand name and a logo on it.

The second man was between 6-foot and 6-foot-2 in height with dark hair that curled up in the front and dark eyes. The individual was described as having a muscular build and a tan. He was wearing a white t-shirt and black pants.

Anyone with information about this incident should call the UMPD at 545-0893 or call the TIPS line to give anonymous information at 577-8477.

The department suggests that in order to prevent crimes of these types from occurring, students lock their doors at all times, even while in their rooms, and report all suspicious persons and activities.

Detainee may be US citizen, now in VA

By Ken Campbell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The second possible American Taliban fighter, Yaser Esam Hamdi, is currently being held at a U.S. Navy facility in Norfolk, Va. according to Pentagon sources.

Assistant secretary of Defense for Public Affairs Victoria Clarke told reporters that Hamdi is in the United States, but that his future is still unknown.

"He's in Norfolk, at the brig, getting good treatment. As a captured enemy combatant, he remains under control of the Department of Defense," Clarke said in a press briefing. "If he is, if he does, indeed, have U.S. citizenship, then he would not be a candidate for the military commission. Beyond that, I just can't speculate about what we might do."

Clarke said that there was still some question as to Hamdi's citizenship that the Justice department is trying to clear up.

"I don't know that I sense any reluctance on anyone's part, other than to be very accurate and be very precise. So I think that's what they're trying to do – to make absolutely sure. It looks as though he does have U.S. citizenship," Clarke said. "But also, on every one of these, we're going to take them very carefully and very deliberately and make sure we do the right thing, not necessarily the fast thing."

Hamdi was captured during the November 2001 prison uprising by Taliban fighters near Mazar-e Sharif. Another American citizen, John Walker Lindh, was also captured in that area. Walker currently faces criminal charges for alleged crimes against the United States. Hamdi was among the detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The possibility of Hamdi being a U.S. citizen surfaced earlier in April, when the department of Justice said it found a Baton Rouge, La. birth certificate for the man.

As a captured combatant, Hamdi can be held as long as needed, Clarke said.

"I don't know if it's a policy or a law, but a practice, and I think fairly common under the Geneva Convention, that for the length – for the duration of a conflict, you could hold people you have captured as enemy combatants," Clarke said. "That is my understanding of it."

Clarke was quick to point out that the Defense department has no interest in holding large numbers of detainees, despite recent construction of new prisoner facilities at Guantanamo Bay.

"We have no big desire to have any large numbers of detainees for any great length of time. We have a very, very strong preference to make sure that people who have made very clear that it wants to kill and harm Americans and our friends, remain off the streets," Clarke said. "And again, words like "indefinitely" – we believe the war on terrorism will take some time; we believe it will take some time in Afghanistan. But I couldn't put a time certain to it. But if you look at previous conflicts, people were held for quite a long time.

"And the facility, we've planned all along to have more permanent facilities that were appropriate for the circumstances there, make it better in terms of security. Also, I believe, make it better in terms of the detainees," Clarke added. "Instead of being walked to a latrine however many times a day, that will be in the facilities themselves. So I think it's just an appropriate evolution of what we said all along we would need to do."

ject is teaching these young writers that their stories are important and that their lives are worth writing about. She hopes the UMass students can create a space where the students can feel free to create.

"The project emphasis' the telling of stories, of what the child knows, and honoring knowledge," she said. "We want to recognize and celebrate the different ways young people think."

Sussbauer, said Jordan, brings freshness into the class, and the students react positively to his lessons. They sense an authenticity in that he is a writer, and they take chances with their writing they do not take with her.

"I definitely see a confidence," she said. "A number of them who wouldn't have read their work earlier are sharing their stories. He really draws it out of them."

Holland said this program brings writers into schools that cannot otherwise afford residence programs.

"Mohawk is one of the poorest school districts in the state," she said.

"UMass can apply the knowledge, resources and expertise of MFA writing students to improve the writing skills of a school population that generally lacks other resources for the arts and communication."

Deborah McCutchen, a graduate student working at Heath Elementary School added, "The schools we work with are chronically under-funded, but the teachers are imaginative, flexible and often fine writers."

The project will culminate with an anthology and a reading in May. Jordan said the anthology would be a mix of poetry, fiction and autobiography. He has helped the students start pieces, and each one will chose their strongest work for the publication.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

South Africa's troubles are far from over

When South African writer Sindiwe Magona lectured at the University of Massachusetts Wednesday night, she said the problems facing her home country are far from over. Magona worries that the international community views South Africa as a "success story," without recognizing the violence, poverty and inequities that still exist.

She also warned that the African National Congress, the black-dominated political party that now rules South Africa, is a party like any other and subject to corruption.

"People talk about South African blacks as people who are noble," she said. "But Apartheid did not make us noble. It only made us people who were oppressed. It did not give us wings. We are still subject to the frailties that all other humans are subject to."

The signs of "frailties" among the African National Congress are already evident. South African President Thabo Mbeki has refused to oppose Zimbabwean dictator Robert Mugabe, despite the brutality of Mugabe's regime. Mugabe has openly advocated the murder of white landowners and has ensured the disappearance of many of his political opponents. He recently rigged Zimbabwe's presidential election and, unsurprisingly, won another six years in office.

Despite all of Mugabe's murderous tactics, Mbeki, like most other African leaders, has refused to openly condemn him or his party, the ZANU-PF. While international leaders in Europe have been quick to call Mugabe's recent sham election for what it truly is, Mbeki has not.

Mbeki has, of course, had many accomplishments in office, yet his support for Mugabe, coupled with his earlier statements asserting that HIV and AIDS are unrelated, should give the world pause to think. Mbeki should not be seen only as a benevolent statesman simply because he was second-in-command to former President Mandela.

South Africa is, as Magona pointed out, a land that still faces many problems. The inequities caused by Apartheid did not go away simply because of the creation of a democratic government. The average white South African earns roughly 10 times as much as the average black South African.

Meanwhile, the percentage of South Africans estimated to be infected with HIV is roughly 20 percent. There is a common perception there, as in other African nations, that sex with a virgin will cure the disease. Naturally, this perception only increases the spread of the virus and likely boosts the number of rapes as well.

The city of Johannesburg is often referred to as the "crime capital of the world." The number of murders, robberies and rapes has skyrocketed across the nation.

The world cannot assume that these problems will be solved simply because the African National Congress is in power.

Formal introductions

Why hello there. I'm sorry. It must seem very rude of me to ramble on and on like I have before introducing myself. My name is Yousef Munayyer, and if you haven't been able to piece this together yet, I'm a Friday columnist.

I'm sure many people have read some of the things I have written and have wondered why I write such things. This is a perfect opportunity to tell you why.

Many may have wondered why I write so much about the Middle East. Well, you see, I tend to write about things that make me think, and the conflicts that are flaring in the Middle East make me think about many things. Some of the opinions I express may not be exactly like what others may believe. Well, too bad. Since I'm not the type to get angry, I must say I do get annoyed with people who say that my opinions are biased and one sided. I understand that there are many out there who might see my opinions as inflammatory or provocative, at the least, but the statements I make are based on information I have read and people I have talked to. Sorry to disappoint some, but I don't generally rely on CNN. When events occur, especially those in the Middle East conflict, I tend to check several websites for news. Generally, those would be an American news agency along with an Arab news source as well as a European and Israeli news source.

YOUSEF MUNAYYER

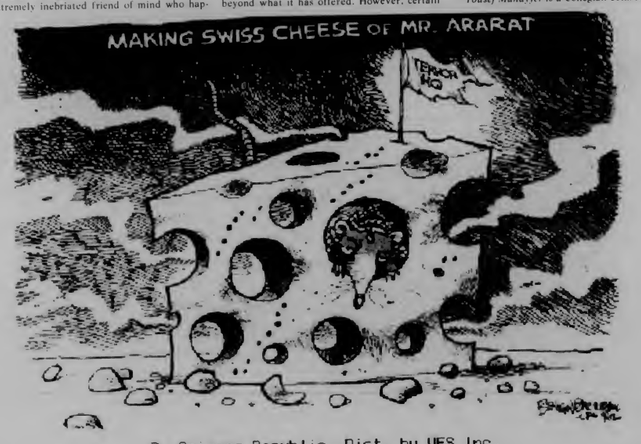
I love to express my opinion, and those who know me the best, know very well that I'm not one to stay quiet in a discussion. I also enjoy being able to spread my thoughts and ideas to you. It really does annoy me when people try to attack my credibility. It seems that people attack my credibility before they attack my opinions. What does this say about their argument?

Possibly one of the most relevant quotes I have heard all semester was a quote I heard from an extremely inebriated friend of mind who happened to mumble while strolling down the hallway, "I may not agree with what you say, but I defend to the death your right to say it." Amazing how the mind works in that state, eh?

This might be a good time for me to tell you the things that I utterly dislike. I have noticed for a while what things bother me more than others, so for introduction purposes and for all those people out there that would like annoy me, get your note books out. In no particular order: (1) Being called a liar. Not that anyone may like to be called a liar, but I take particular offense to it. (2) Guys who try to use alcohol to better their chances with the opposite sex. People like that get no respect from me whatsoever and really rival pond scum for a position in the social hierarchy. (3) The death of innocent people. I cannot describe in words (even though that is part of my job here) how much this disturbs me. In fact, this is one of the things that push me past annoyance into shear belligerence. (4) Ignorance. Enough said. And I think that's pretty much it. Oh, and I don't like violence. (However, I reserve the right to defend myself in any violent interactions, so don't get any bright ideas.)

Well enough about me. Let's get back to the more pressing issue at hand. Sorry to disappoint any of those who thought they could get a week off without hearing me express my opinion on what's going on in the Middle East, but honestly, what did you expect?

I can only continue to say that the violence that is going on over seas has to stop. Everyone I have spoken to has said that they can't bear to continue hearing the news, and I can only imagine the fear in the hearts of the people that live in the Middle East that have to deal with this everyday.



Neither side wants to make concessions beyond what it has offered. However, certain things must be recognized as sticking points. If peace in the Middle East is to be achieved, Palestinian must recognize Israel's right to exist in peace. In order to counterbalance this, Israel must find a way to compensate Palestinian refugees who were exiled from their homes in 1948.

The Palestinians need to know that Israel not only will admit to the expulsion of native Palestinians in 1948 but also will be willing to do something about it. Even if the west bank and Gaza are given to the Palestinians, the question of the refugees still remains. That is why I do not believe the conflict will end with the creation of a Palestinian state in only 22 percent of historic Palestine.

The issue of the refugees is the key to finding the solution to a lasting just peace. For those who doubt what happened to the refugees in 1948, I urge you to consider this quote by Yitzhak Rabin, Israeli war officer of the time: "After attacking Lydda [later called Lod] and then Ramla...What would they do with the 50,000 civilians living in the two cities [?]...Not even Ben-Gurion could offer a solution...and during the discussion at operation headquarters, he [Ben-Gurion] remained silent, as was his habit in such situations. Clearly, we could not leave [Lydda's] populace in our rear."

After the expulsion it's plain to see that the refugees have a claim, and this has to be addressed. Violence is not the way to address it, not on the Palestinian side or the Israeli side, but both sides have to be willing to make mutual concessions. Violence between the sides equates in death. I leave you with the words of Sun Tzu, possibly the greatest general in the history of war: "Defeating your enemy in hundreds of battles is not the pinnacle of war; the pinnacle of war is persuading your enemy without entering battle."

Letters to the editor: 'Khach,' attendance and more union conflict

To the editor

As president and founder of Khach Card, as well as being a proud UMass alumnus, I had much to be concerned about the with Thursday, April 3 feature article in which Collegian writer Sarah Pott asks if my business is a "scam." The Collegian should support fair and balanced reporting, and if this were the case, I would be very pleased. Instead, Sarah chose to interview six students that happened to live right in her dorm, four of which live closer than four doors down the hall. Pretty convenient reporting, if you ask me.

I truly appreciate the article, and if read in its entirety, I feel any student will have learned that Khach Card is a very good thing. The problem is many students simply don't have time to read the whole article – over 30 paragraphs long. Many just catch the headlines and graphics, one of which reads, "Is the Khach Card a Scam?" I along with over 1,500 proud Khach Card users and 40 local business owners – think this is an injustice to what we all feel is a wonderful product for Amherst.

Where did she even get the idea to pose such a ludicrous question, when I have not received one complaint from a customer regarding the validity and worth of my product? She got it from a student that was quoted in the article by saying, "The card was a scam!" What The Collegian doesn't tell you is that this student had never even heard of Khach Card. Upon contacting this student, she was apologetic that her quote was taken drastically out of context. She told me that what she really said was, "Oh, the card was a scam...[chuckle]...why, what is the Khach Card anyway?"

This student had never even heard of my company and was kidding when she said what she did, so what gives the Collegian the right to not only put her quote in the article, but to sensationalize it to the point that it becomes what most people take away from skimming the headlines. I had a feeling that this quote was a little funny. Just a little case of looking for a bit of controversy to juice up an otherwise one-sided, feel-good story of how Khach Card gives students well over $200 worth of free food and merchandise, plus a great, on-going discount card for a small up-front investment of $12. Once again, I am thankful that the Collegian wrote about me, but I am a little miffed by their misrepresentation of a quote, something I felt could have easily been spared.

To the editor:

In regards to the op-ed piece, "Togetherness comes to an end" in Wednesday's Collegian, Scott Eldridge neglects the fact that the vast majority of RA union "supporters," such as myself, are members of the same union that the RAs affiliated with by a majority vote. As union members, we see the RAs' struggle as our own. This is what a union is about. It means that all members support the struggle of other members.

The RA union decided to involve other UAW members and to reach out to other campus groups, fellow students and workers for support. We answered their call. If, as an RA, you disagree with this decision or the union's direct action tactics, then I would suggest that the Collegian is not the proper forum to express your concerns.

You should express these concerns to your fellow RAs at the next RA union membership meeting. The UAW is a democratic union. If you oppose disruptive demonstrations, loud chanting or sarcastic taunts directed at the administration, then you have a right to vote against such actions.

If you are opposed in principle to the union, it is a different matter.

But in that case, you would feel you weren't being "represented," no matter what actions the RA union engaged in. However, it is still your union, and you have a right to have your voice heard. If you have better suggestions on how RAs can fight the administration's illegal refusal to bargain (and Javier Cevallos's stated intention to drag the process out for "four or five Years"), then bring those ideas to a meeting.

The RA union members who engaged in the sit-ins yesterday are fighting for the very representation of which you speak. They have voted for representation and are demanding the University obey the law and bargain with them. As far as non-RA union members and supporters are concerned, we will continue to support the RAs in whatever action they deem appropriate.

To the editor:

I read [Sam Wilkinson's] "Dear Principal, about my attendance" at a very timely hour...just after I learned that I have failed one of "Mr. Burt's" classes due to my lack of attendance. I knew from day one that I would despise his class, and I tried desperately to find something else to replace it. I hounded and begged professors, but all of them told me with regretful smiles that no other classes were available. Hoping to graduate only a semester late, I decided to stick it out in Burt's class. In retrospect, I should have just dropped the course, or escaped with a "W" while I had the chance, but due to my own fault, I didn't realize until a few days ago that Mr. Burt's attendance policy here at UMass high school was so strict.

I definitely realize that I screwed up, and indeed I've opted to never take any of Burt's classes again, but I still find fault with the attendance policy itself. Now, we're all technically adults here in college, and normally I've been treated like one by my professors. I understand that work needs to be done and turned in on time, and normally I've been very good at this. I'm an Honors student who is fortunate enough to have a full academic scholarship to this once-fine and fairly prestigious university. I work hard, and normally I get all my work done. But when you're an adult, sometimes this thing called "life" can get in the way of a satisfactory performance, even if you're in college and enrolled in classes with abnormally strict attendance policies. Sometimes events happen in "life," which can't be neatly summarized in a doctor's note, cause you to miss some classes. In some way, I admire Burt's policy, since I have in my four years at UMass experienced a few professors who didn't show up to multiple classes and acted as if teaching was an afterthought. Although this is a problem, I personally don't think that requiring a doctor's note to explain an absence and dropping your grade by one full letter for each absence over two are ways to respond to this.

In theory, we should show up to class because we want to, but in the current state of things on this campus, many of us have to take classes that we don't want to because all of the ones that we want to take are full. Despite the best efforts of our administrators to make our lives as difficult and annoying as possible, some of us suck it up and take the lousy classes anyway because we want to try to graduate on time. At least now, Mr.

Burt's class will be one less thing for me to deal with this semester. I think I'll accept my F as a personal protest against the lack of choices that we are being given at this University, even as we all are going through the motions of pre-registration for classes that may not even be offered next semester.

Rock sex, underpants

By Nika Martin
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Underwear: Don't come home without it

So I never quite understood the whole concept behind girls throwing their undergarments to rock stars at concerts. Think about it for a second: you put your underwear on before you get dressed. You don't do it for your health; you do it because it's necessary. Most girls spend a good deal of money buying expensive bras and panties at Victoria's Secret or Macy's. A nice bra can cost anywhere from $25-$45. Panties? Well I'd say those go for about $10-$20 for a matching set. So why would any girl willingly throw their $65 matching set of pink lace bra and panties at some smelly, sweaty, bad-breathed, drunken, long haired man?

I figure they do it for the thrill of telling friends that Steven Tyler or Dave Matthews actually "touched" their underwear. Maybe it's the excitement of wondering what he will do with the goods offstage. My guess is that rock stars collect ladies' underwear and have them sewn into quilts for the guest rooms in all their Los Angeles and Aspen homes.

Or maybe they donate the clothing to charity and homeless people they meet on the street. I can just imagine Mark McGrath walking up to a person on the street in New York and saying, "Hi. I'm Mark McGrath, a famous rock star. I have some lovely underwear that was thrown at me on my last U.S. tour, and I'd love for you to have it. It's my gift to you, my personal way of giving back to the community."

Now if you've thrown your precious pink underwear at a rock star, you are probably out about 50 bucks for tickets. But in order to throw it and have it actually make the stage, you have to be pretty darn close, so lets add in another $150. Now you know you've bought a beer (or three), a pretzel, hotdog and parking – another $24. So now your total expenditures amount to a whopping $224. According to my calculations, you've spent all the money you worked so hard for, bagging jars of pickles and cans of Spam at the supermarket, and have actually left the concert with less than you came with.

So in the future, I advise this: Buy cheap underwear and keep it to throw at your favorite musicians. Get tickets for seats that are further back and bring a fishing pole to dangle your draws at the men. It's more creative, and it's sure to catch their attention far easier than your crotchless lacies.

Wanted: Rock Sex Appeal

How is it that rock stars come off so damn sexy? What the hell? I mean, honestly, take a look at Mick Jagger. His mouth is huge. Is he really sexy? Kurt Cobain: serious need of a haircut. Elvis: his pants were tight, but not in a good way. Sheryl Crow looks like a mom. Madonna, well, she's a mom who looks like she invaded a 13-year-old's closet.

So, following in the grand old tradition of conforming to the norms, I decided a long time ago that since I'm a musician and have an interest in fashion, I should make it my goal to look like a rock star every day. Unfortunately, having to be at work at 8 a.m. with classes all day long somehow put a damper on my enthusiasm for getting ready in the morning.

I'm sure you can imagine that getting up at 5 a.m. to set my hair in gigantic rollers, painting my nails to match my clothes and applying the perfect makeup leaves no time for studying or homework. It's a tough job, but somebody has to do it. Most rock stars have paid employees that do these sorts of things for them, but with the UMass budget cuts, I've had to cut my Revlon collection by nearly 20 percent.

In any case, I am not a quitter. I began thinking about all the necessary modifications at cost-effective prices: plastic surgery to make my mouth really wide with huge lips, bleached blonde hair, scraggly hair (I might already have that one covered) and a new name like "Blue." My clothes must look like they were made to fit the kid sister I don't have.

Anyhow, in the meantime, I have to really think about what it means to be "rock star sexy." They have something that us common folk don't, and I'm going to find out exactly what it is.

Black at the FAC

By Sam Wilkinson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Lewis Black shook his jowls and rolled his eyes and walked away from the microphone. He walked around the two wooden stools behind him and rubbed at his face. He walked back toward the crowd and said, "No."

"You didn't mean that. You could not have possibly meant that. Don't make me re-evaluate my position on this school," he warned the crowd, after a few students cheered Britney Spears' name. Black almost seemed genuinely angry with people cheering on somebody who, "can't sing!"

Black screamed that at the crowd, to roars of approval. Black screamed a lot of things Tuesday night.

Like any good comedian, Black warned the crowd up. He told jokes about the Campus Center Hotel – "I'd definitely stay there if I was a heroin addict." He told jokes about the Yankees – "I hate them. They buy all of the best players, every year, and then they hold guns to the heads of anybody that won't come and play for them." He told jokes about the Red Sox – "So I started cheering again for the Red Sox and last year, they fucked me in my heart."

He teased the crowd with his older, more familiar jokes. But when an audience member screamed that Black should "do the horse!" Black shook his head.

"I won't do the horse," he said, referring to an older set of jokes about his drug use carrying him through the unbelievable stupidity of others. "Too much has happened since the horse. And we have a lot to talk about."

And we did.

Familiarly out of the way, Black launched into an environmental diatribe, again about the scourge of global warming. It is a topic he has broached in the past – "We don't have an ozone layer. We have saran wrap; we have rockets; fix it!" he has screamed.

This time, he noted that global warming brought about an autumn that was more like a spring. He noted that America opted not to sign the Kyoto Protocol, an environmental treaty signed by 130 other nations designed to slow global warming. He pointed out that while this past fall was the hottest on record, America was scurrying for protection from anthrax and small pox.

"How are you going to get anthrax or small pox? You fuck a sheep," Black said, almost imploring the audience to join with him in his concern on global warming.

Mixed with his serious commentaries were offhand comments. In the midst of his anthrax rant, he told of an adventure he made to perform at the University of Missouri-Rollo.

"[Were] those people were worried about anthrax?" he asked us. He called his life a great unfolding tapestry and suggested that Rollo was another part of his story, also pointing out that living in that part of America was the equivalent of being dead.

Seamlessly, he moved from the importance of the last few months into the absurdity of last year's Super Bowl, pointing out that commercials have overtaken our most beloved sporting event. He decried the presence of N'Sync, Aerosmith and Britney Spears at the Super Bowl Halftime show and practically lost it after a few students cheered Spears' name.

But the culture rant was just a brief sojourn from his crowning jewel – a savage attack on America post Sept. 11.

President Bush got it. He screamed about the $500 tax refund given to some Americans last year.

"We certainly didn't have anything better to spend the money on. The roads and bridges are in perfect condition. Education's certainly doing well," Black said, building. Education might have been damning enough, considering this University's current economic condition. But then, "...Airport Security has never been better."

He screamed the last part. It would have been shocking if everybody hadn't laughed so hard. Few people have been willing to joke about the worst single disaster in American history, but Black showed no willingness to back off.

He decried airport security, which went from, "no security at all to unbelievably tight security, and nothing has changed. Nothing is better." He told stories of mom's with babies being searched, "as if they'd hand their children to the people next to them while attacking the pilot."

He told stories about old women in wheelchairs being searched and wondered what the hell was going on.

"Until something really weird happens, use some common sense. These people aren't going to attack pilots."

He questioned our nation's priorities after the attack, wondering why we're still discussing some issues – "I think we've learned that gay marriage is at the bottom of page six on the list of things that are important right now."

The crowd ate it up. Well, most of it.

At times, it seemed as if the crowd didn't want to hear about serious issues. It didn't want to hear about the attacks, or it didn't want to hear some of Black's racier jokes. He excoriated them at times, telling the crowd to raucous approval that, "political correctness is stupid."

But he seemed unwilling to slow his train just because the crowd wasn't interested. Where he wanted to point out vast social ills, it seemed as if some wanted nothing more than screamed curse words.

Still, his bombast overwhelmed the audience. They may not have wanted to take some of his rides, but they went along anyway. Some waited for the next round of screaming.

Most heard a brilliant social comedian rightly critiquing some of society's stupidest behaviors. Black amazed because he blended his message in with his comedy. It might have been tough to draw the line between the two, but maybe that was his point.

He said that comedy was his way of dealing with the world, even Sept. 11. Through it all, that might have been his most important message.

Not worth the ink to record their names, the three comedians before Black at Tuesday night's show were caustically unfunny. Relying on a cheap assortment of cuss-words and minority jokes, they seemed determined to prove that any idiot can get booked with America's best standup comic.

If those three hope for a career of small gigs in small towns in small comedy clubs where the patrons laugh because they're drunk, then all three have a bright future ahead of them. If they're secretly hoping for HBO specials and television pilots, they'd better come up with something more original than the outrageously unfunny humor they peddled Tuesday night.

Irving Berlin, Fosse-style

By Julie Burrell
COLLEGIAN STAFF

COURTESY FINE ARTS CENTER

Winnie (Amy Elkins) and Tommy (Albert Altovilla) perform the charming number, "Who Do You Love, I Hope" in Annie Get Your Gun.

The bus-and-truck tour, as they are affectionately called, usually produces a solid, traditional, if homogenous, show because it plays to a wide range of audiences. The tours that have stopped at UMass have been of this sort (like last year's opera Carmen, or last semester's Tartuffe). But last week's touring production of Irving Berlin's Annie Get Your Gun wasn't exactly solid or traditional. Produced by Washington, D.C.-based Troika Entertainment, it played for one night at the Fine Arts Center last week.

Not that reinterpretation of a traditional show is a bad thing, but Annie is the kind of show that one expects will follow tradition.

The story isn't complicated: Annie Oakley, the picture of unsophistication but a whiz with a shotgun, meets up with Buffalo Bill and his Wild West Show. She falls in love with another sharp shooter, Frank Butler, and as she's falling, she grows older and wiser.

Berlin created Annie specifically for Broadway belter Ethel Merman. Her vocal abilities are the stuff of legends (like how she could reach the back of the house without a microphone), so one expects a big, brassy belting Annie. Well, one would expect that before 1999's revival starring Bernadette Peters as Ms. Oakley. Peters may be sassy, but she's super sweet. She has the same star power, as reflected at the box office, but she certainly doesn't have Merman's brass. Annie has thus been reinvented, but within the bounds of tradition.

So Troika's casting of sweet-singing Bonnie Estes as the star wasn't surprising, just disappointing. Estes has the sex appeal of Ann-Margret and a Merman-esque brashness. This would be fine, except that her tender voice can't keep up with her assertive character. In the tender "Moonshine Lullaby," she excels, but she falters when "I Got the Sun in the Morning" is sung in the same fashion.

The rest of the cast doesn't fair all that well either. Her love interest Frank Butler, played by Stephen Valahovic, is supposed to be arrogantly charming. But here, he's mostly cocky and not very charming. And Chris McDaniel as Buffalo Bill isn't the showman one would like.

Young lovers Winnie (Amy Elkins) and Tommy (Albert Altovilla), though, are wonderful. Their energetic love song "Who Do You Love, I Hope" is the highlight of the show. They're perfectly naive, jealous, deliriously happy and delightful. If only Annie and Frank's love story played as well.

The ensemble – onstage for almost every number – wasn't terribly impressive, and their vocal enthusiasm all but disappeared after the first number. Director and choreographer Joey McKneely would have done better to make a cleaner stage, if he couldn't evoke some energy from his cast. Overall, the production lacked a unifying feeling. Some songs were really good when the characters and choreography came together. But, most songs just fell flat.

McKneely's oddest choice came in the opener, "There's No Business Like Show Business." Instead of the bold, bright song it usually is, the stage was darkly light with red and bathed with shadows. The song tempo slowed so much one wouldn't recognize the song immediately. The dancers moved across the stage slowly, in mimed circus poses (for instance, a tight rope walk), while throwing sparkly confetti into the air. Think Fosse meets a 40s musical. It looked like the cast of the revival of Chicago had wandered onstage and started singing "Razzle Dazzle." Confused? You should be.

And then there are the costumes. Troika's note in the playbill says, "The company prides itself on thinking outside the apple." The costumes were designed by William Ivey Long, the same designer who did the Broadway revival. It doesn't seem that the company's assertion really holds true. And the skimpy faux old west costumes again look as if the design team was trying to sexualize Annie way more than the script can actually support. The production would have done better to stick with tradition – it isn't always boring.

Women's coach named

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a search lasting over three weeks, the University of Massachusetts Athletic Department announced the hiring of the head coach of the women's basketball team.

Marnie Dacko was named to the position at a press conference held at the Mullins Center yesterday, becoming the ninth coach of the team in its history. Dacko leaves Cornell University after a seven-year tenure as the head coach of the school's women's basketball team.

"We're thrilled to have Marnie in charge of our program of women's basketball. It's great to have a proven coach at several different programs," Athletic Director Robert Marcum said in his introduction of Dacko.

"She's always been able to improve all of the programs at various levels, and she's also graduated her people, which is most important," Marcum added.

Dacko leaves behind a Big Red program which she led to a cumulative 80-104 record over seven seasons, a .435 winning percentage. Her best season at Cornell came this year, in which her team finished tied for second in the Ivy League with an 8-6 record, 14-13 overall.

Prior to her term at the Ithaca, N.Y., Dacko served as an assistant coach at Northwestern for 11 years, a program that made four NCAA tournament appearances during her term. She also assisted at St. John's from 1979-84, coaching a program that won two Big East championships in her stay.

"I bring a lot of history with me; I think the most difficult thing was leaving my players at Cornell behind," Dacko said. "It's bittersweet."

She takes the reins from former coach Joanie O'Brien, who coached the team to a disappointing 12-18 record this year, 8-8 in the Atlantic 10. However, O'Brien's Minutewomen finished the season relatively strong, winning nine of 13 games down the stretch and reaching the conference semifinals.

"When I look forward and look ahead to seven seniors and a group of hungry, young, talented women, I'm very excited," Dacko said.

The Athletic Department had announced on March 18 that it would be forming a search committee to find O'Brien's replacement. The committee, which consisted of Associate Athletic Director Elaine Sortino, former UMass men's basketball coach Jack Leaman, and Dean of Students Jo-Ann Vanin. According to Marcum, the three-person group came to a unanimous decision as to who it wanted to lead the Minutewomen.

"Very seldom do you find a search committee that agrees 100 percent on a candidate," Marcum said. "They might come to a consensus from time to time, but in the case of our committee, Marnie was number one all the way." He mentioned that the group was most impressed with her personality, and her previous success in both on-court accomplishment, and the high graduation rate of her players off the court.

When asked about her style of play that she will bring to Amherst, she explained that her teams loved to run up and down the court, and was apt to press on defense. She explained her style of play as "unselfish but exciting." Dacko will bring her assistant coach Mary Ciuk from Ithaca to her staff at UMass.

She had not met with her new team prior to the press conference, and she showed her unfamiliarity with her new troops, accidentally referring to two of her new players as "Nekole Butler and Jen Smith." But she expressed excitement at coming to a school with "great tradition" and that she looks forward to getting started.

"There's some things that will change, but I think that you will find an exciting brand of basketball," Dacko said. "I'm committed to get the community involved, and my dream is to fill the Mullins Center up for a women's basketball game.

"I'll do whatever it takes to bring a winner here."

Jen Butler and the Massachusetts women's basketball team couldn't get past Temple in the A-10 Tournament last year. Now they will have a new coach to help them try to get over the hump.

Dacko must utilize current talent

Based solely on talent, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will have to be considered one of the favorites to win the Atlantic 10 East next year. Many of the A-10 officials said as much at March's conference tournament in Philadelphia.

The Minutewomen have a solid one-two punch returning next year underneath the basket in seniors Jen Butler and Nekole Smith (or is it Jen Smith and Nekole Butler?).

Butler was robbed of an A-10 All Conference first team selection in 2001-02.

Smith, who looked better and better as the season went on, will be another year removed from knee surgery and continue as a terrific scoring option from 18 feet and in.

Swing players Amber Sneed, Ebony Pegues and Cleo Foster will each have another year of experience under their belts. Sneed emerged as a force in the postseason, making clutch baskets and tearing down momentum-swinging rebounds. As the season progressed, Pegues began to come into her own as a scoring threat. With the added patience that comes with an offseason of reflection and practice, she has a real chance to make a major impact in 2002-03.

Foster meanwhile, continued to improve on what has always been tremendous defense. She had major trouble handling the ball during the first half of the season, but steadily improved by the end of the year.

As for the point guard position, how about two players who contributed to the team in a major way as rookies? Katie Nelson was the team's starting point guard from game one last season and averaged almost 37 minutes per game. She became more and more of a leader on the court as the season went on – a must for a good floor general.

Monique Govan was given a little more time to develop, but showed her skills off during the A-10 portion of the schedule. Her biggest moment came in the biggest game of the season, when No. 15 took the ball coast-to-coast with just under seven seconds left to send the A-10 semifinal against Temple and sunk a floater to send the game into overtime.

Sounds like a pretty good team with a good chance for a heck of a season, huh?

But.

Where there are usually question marks about the players on the team, there now are questions about the coach. Questions that haven't been asked since Joanie O'Brien was coming to Amherst more than 10 years ago.

Can the new coach cut it?

This is the question that newly hired Coach Marnie Dacko will try to answer with a resounding yes. The former Cornell sideline prowler has to prove she can cut it to her players, to the fans and to the administration – which claims to have chosen her via what can only be described as the smallest "nationwide search" of all time – that she can cut it.

She wasn't impressively successful at Cornell. Granted, she did improve a terrible team and make it relatively respectable within its conference (sound familiar?), but an 80-104 overall record in the Ivy League isn't exactly terrific. Some of those losses came because of the lack of quality players when Dacko got there, but for a program that some would like to consider having a solid tradition, a .435 winning percentage isn't exactly going to help create new interest in the women's basketball team.

It is obvious that Dacko has the horses to make a solid run at the A-10 title this year. But we saw the men's team struggle with a pretty solid group of players, because they didn't fit into the coach's system.

This could happen again, and struggle for that reason wouldn't be entirely her fault, because they aren't her recruits. But it will be the recruiting class that comes in next year to replace the seven seniors that will be leaving after 2002-03 that will surely prove her worth.

But let's not get ahead of ourselves. After all, next year's team has a shot to be very good, and Marnie Dacko has a chance to prove that she can cut it.

Young arms make future look bright

After being plagued by ineffectiveness on the mound for the majority of the season, two underclassmen stepped up for the Massachusetts baseball team in the past two days.

The Minutemen (10-15, 2-7 Atlantic 10) received a stellar pitching performance from freshman Mike Crane (1-0) in yesterday's 2-1 win at Northeastern. In just his second career start, the rookie went 7 1/3 innings, struck out six opposing batters and gave up just one run. Crane scattered nine hits and earned the first win of his career.

UMass	2
Northeastern	1
UConn	1

The Braintree, Mass. native has had some relative success for the Maroon and White this season. He entered the game third on the team in earned run average with 5.00 while averaging one strikeout per inning pitched.

UMass scored both of its runs in the second inning, breaking a scoreless tie when junior Jeff Ahlert singled and scored on a Tim Klett double. Klett then stole third and scored on a ground-out by Adam Stojanowski.

That was all the runs Coach Mike Stone's squad would need as Crane and classmate Keith Doherty, who came in for the final 2 2/3 innings to earn his first career save, perfectly executed a "bend but don't break" style – giving up 11 hits, but just one run.

Crane's impressive performance came just one day after sophomore Brandon White pitched the best game of his young career at Connecticut. White went the distance, giving up just one run while striking out four, but was charged with the loss, as the Minutemen were unable to put up a single run against the Husky's pitching.

UConn's Josh MacDonald and Mike James combined for a four-hit shutout of the Maroon and White. MacDonald improved to 1-1 on the year, while James pitched the ninth for the his sixth save of the season.

After three weekday, non-conference games, the Minutemen will head to Kingston, R.I. to take on the University of Rhode Island in a three-game series. URI (14-16, 3-6 A-10), having been swept by Duquesne last weekend, is as desperate for a conference win as UMass.

After last weekend's struggles, Maroon and White captain Aaron Senez looked forward to this matchup with the Rams and the rest of the A-10.

"Now is when we are playing everyone in our side of the league," Senez said. "We had tough times, but there is a lot of season left. The most important games are coming up."

Indeed. And this week's strong performances on the mound from a pair of underclassmen show some promise for the rest of the team's season.

As long as the bats show up.

Untouchable duo lead UMass to 30th win

Holtz, Hadley sweep twinbill

Kaila Holtz was due for a bad game.

That is, if you call three runs on five hits with nine strikeouts a bad game. The UMass softball team tripled the Harvard total, however, and won the first game of its doubleheader 9-3 yesterday.

UMass	9	2
Harvard	3	1

Holtz earned her twelfth win of the season with the victory, and her nine strikeouts is the junior hurler's season-high, giving her a total of 86 on the year.

In the second half of the doubleheader, senior Jen Hadley provided the encore, letting up one run on six hits, with 11 strikeouts to vault her past Holtz for number one in the team strikeout standings.

The offense would need Hadley's mastery, and an extra at-bat, as it squeaked out two runs against the Crimson. Senior Teri Rooney doubled in the third inning to score sophomore Aisha Franke and knot the game at one run, and freshman Hilary Puglia pinch-hit a single to drive home the deciding run in extra innings.

The game marked Rooney's first time on the field since suffering injuries in last weekend's action with St. Joseph's.

"I really wanted to be involved with the competition," Rooney said. "It was a little stiff, but it felt good to get back out there."

In the early session, the Minutewomen rallied in the third and fifth innings to take the victory. In the third, Franke, Rooney, and junior Emily Robustelli had three consecutive base hits, and the Maroon and White used them to take a 3-0 lead.

After the Crimson bounced back with scattered base hits, the UMass bats exploded in the sixth inning for five runs on five hits, with Rooney and Robustelli hitting one- and two-RBI singles in the effort.

That was all Holtz would need to seal the victory in the matinee.

"It was definitely a well played game, really competitive," Rooney said. "Our pitching was great, our defense was outstanding, and our hitting was the best it's been in a long time."

The Minutewomen earned their 30th victory with the 2-1 nightcap win, making them the first team in the Atlantic 10 to do so.

They'll bring the momentum from the successful day in the ivy branches of Cambridge with them to Rhode Island Saturday, along with an undefeated A-10 record (9-0).

UMass meets up with the Rams for a doubleheader on Saturday, followed by one more clash on Sunday.

Rhode Island brings arguably one of the best players with it in senior pitcher Gwen Rack, who currently resides on the A-10 leaderboards for both strikeouts and hits (144 and 34, respectively.) The Maroon and White, meanwhile, brings the best pitching staff in the Atlantic 10, along with the top three pitchers in the conference. Hadley (0.82 ERA), Holtz (1.17 ERA) and freshman standout Kelli Arnold (1.54) have been the crown jewels of a squad that hasn't lost a game since Mar. 19.

That's not to take away from the offense, of course, which has gotten exponentially hotter with the change in the weather, now sitting third in the A-10 with a .277 batting average. UMass also fields the hits, triples and total bases leader in Rooney.

And, just as any successful team normally has, the Minutewomen also bring a team of players that are suited to make a difference behind the scene.

Players like Anna Percy, who has been quietly supplying sparks on both offense and defense, with a .317 batting average and a .939 fielding average. Percy also stepped in with vigor to take the centerfield job while Rooney nursed her injury and made some extraordinary catches in games against Vermont.

Meanwhile, UMass travels to Kingston, R.I. tomorrow, and they bring with them a winning streak that has already told Harvard, UVM and a score of other teams that they mean business.

Mediterranean Diet vs. "The Olive Oil Diet"

By Christopher Theberge
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Statistical evidence suggests that one in two men and one in three women will suffer from cardiovascular disease (CVD) within their lifetime. Despite our knowledge of how nutrition plays an important role in development of this disease, it still remains the #1 killer in the United States. Most of the evidence suggests the Western-style diet (meat and potatoes) is the likely culprit, among other factors. Countries that have a lower prevalence of cardiovascular disease than the U.S. have provided researchers with the foundation to hopefully identify the exact relationship between diet and CVD. Dietary behaviors in populations surrounding the Mediterranean Sea have been of great interest.

The term that we use to describe their food intake is known as the Mediterranean Diet (MD). The MD is high in fruits, vegetables, wheat products, legumes, nuts and seeds, and starchy vegetables (i.e. potatoes). Another important aspect of the diet is the consumption of olive oil, particularly virgin. Olive oil is high in oleic acid, a monounsaturated fat. The major protein sources of the MD include fish and poultry. Very little red meat is consumed. Dairy products are consumed in moderate amounts, with egg consumption ranging from zero to four times per week. One final diet constituent remaining is the moderate consumption of red wine. It should be noted that the MD is a generic term and varies greatly among countries in the area.

Of all the research being conducted on the MD, most of the interest has rested in the consumption of olive oil. As stated before, olive oil is an excellent source of monounsaturated fat. Monounsaturated fat has shown to lower total and LDL (bad) cholesterol and increase HDL (good) cholesterol. Olive oil is high in a variety of antioxidants and vitamin E. In moderate amounts, olive oil has been associated with a reduced risk of cardiovascular disease.

With all of the "positive" results coming from research studies has led to the promotion of olive oil use. The European Union has offered $190 million to the U.S. as long as they promise to advertise olive oil for 12 years. A variety of books and diet plans have surfaced encouraging olive oil consumption. Some of these products suggest that you just eat more olive oil. The term more valid for this type of diet is "Olive Oil Diet" rather than MD. In order to achieve the benefits from the MD, you must also eat more fruits and vegetables, whole grain products, beans, nuts, seeds, fish and poultry, while lowering your red meat and whole egg consumption. Red wine, in moderation (two glasses per day for men and one glass per day for women), has shown to be "heart-healthy." A variety of antioxidants and phytochemicals found in red grapes are the likely beneficial factors. One very important aspect that is often overlooked is the fact that populations among the Mediterranean are more physically active than we are in the United States.

This article is just to inform the public of the misconceptions that often arise when the media and certain individuals get a hold of information such as this. It is important to note that one thing, in this case olive oil, is not going to reduce your risk of heart disease. Rather, it is a variety of environmental, social, and genetic factors that are involved as well. Exchanging margarine or butter with olive or Canola (another good source of monounsaturated fat) oil will offer a healthier alternative. However, this alone is not going to lower your chances of heart disease. You must also consume a diet rich in fruits and vegetables, lower your saturated fat and cholesterol intake, be physically active, reduce stress levels, and avoid tobacco products. After all of this, you may still be at risk, yet you are at least lowering that risk by adhering to healthy habits. It is never too late to start. Be healthy!

Grad Union campaigning for Con Ed contracts

By Catherine Turner
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The semester may be on the downswing, but the Graduate Employee Organization continues to campaign ahead at full steam.

"GEO as always is swamped," Tom Roberts, Political Science graduate student and Vice President of GEO said.

The tastiest morsel GEO is serving up this week is an entree from the Save UMass menu. GEO is encouraging everyone, including students, faculty and staff, to get on the bus and voice their concerns at a Save UMass rally that is being held on April 25 in Boston at the legislature. Tickets for the rally are available at the GEO office in the Campus Center. Five dollars pays for a bus ride there and back on the day of the rally.

All of the campuses of the University of Massachusetts will be represented at the rally, which will feature speakers of both academic and political backgrounds.

But it doesn't stop there. GEO is also in the midst of contract negotiations for Continuing Education instructors.

"We're still in full swing with the contract negotiations for continuing ed, which consists of part time instructors. It's the for-profit wing of the university. These instructors are the equivalent of adjunct faculty but not regarded as such," Roberts said. "They're the lowest paid instructors on campus but do the same work as regular professors. They don't have parody in pay, they don't have guarantees to work, they don't have health benefits, and they have no control over intellectual property, no ownership rights to syllabi."

The GEO is trying to fold the Con Ed contracts into GEO. They have submitted its proposal and are now waiting for a response from the University. Roberts stressed the importance of these instructors to students.

"Anyone who is taking summer school classes has an interest in coming in [to the GEO office and getting involved]," he said.

In the midst of the constant campaigning and the efforts to Save UMass, GEO has come down with elections fever. The elections this year will be mail-in in order to increase voter turnout. The president, vice president and steering committee positions are all contested, and none of the current leadership is running again, "in the interest of democracy and turnover. It's better to have new people come in and learn how the union works and steer its direction," according to Roberts.

Finally, GEO is involved in the chancellor search and the governor's race. Members met with the chancellor nominees and possible candidates for governor.

"When Robert Reich came the first time, we asked him about budget cuts and child care. He didn't know anything about it," Roberts said. "He came back later and met with the parents of University Child Care. Should he become governor, he'll know about the problems here. We'll be able to hold him accountable."

Meeting with candidates, "increases the chance that governors will pay attention to western Massachusetts, when historically they have not," according to Roberts.

Stay tuned for more information about current campaigns and events in which GEO is involved. For more information, visit the GEO office in the Campus Center.

Attorney advocates defense of abortion rights at Brown

By Emir Senturk
BROWN DAILY HERALD (BROWN U.)

(U-WIRE) PROVIDENCE, R.I. – Sarah Weddington, who successfully argued Roe v. Wade before the U.S. Supreme Court in 1972, warned Brown University students about threats to legalized abortion and encouraged her audience to mobilize to protect women's rights at a lecture Sunday.

Weddington, who was 26 years old during Roe v. Wade, was the youngest person ever to win a case in front of the Supreme Court.

During and after her time at law school, before abortion was legalized, Weddington said women who became pregnant had no choice but to leave college and their jobs. The limitations on women were many, she said.

After she earned her law degree, Weddington said she and her group of friends looked to challenge conventional wisdom.

"People would say, 'No, a woman cannot become a doctor, a lawyer, a politician. A woman cannot do what a man can.' We would ask why," Weddington said.

After her friends asked her if it was illegal to publicize information about safe-yet-illegal abortions, Weddington said she studied Griswald v. Connecticut, which legalized birth control. At the time, abortion was legal in New York and California.

"But none of these services were readily available to anyone, especially not to women who did not have the money," she said. "I wish we had a virtual reality machine so people would find out what it would be like to be pregnant and to have no place to go, no options."

She said doctors and residents at public hospitals voiced concerns over women who were seriously injured from illegal or self-performed abortions. These concerns fueled the start of Roe v. Wade, she said.

"We decided to file a law suit. I did it because I was willing to do it for free and I wanted to practice law," Weddington said, eliciting laughter from the audience.

Weddington outlined the key issues in Roe v. Wade that ultimately led to the court's decision to legalize abortion.

The right of privacy, Weddington said, was guaranteed by the 14th Amendment, "which states that the government cannot deprive someone

Explosion kills four in Kandahar

By Ken Campbell

Four U.S. service members were killed and one other wounded in an accidental explosion while disposing of 107 mm rockets near Kandahar, Afghanistan. The wounded soldier was transported to a medical facility in Kandahar.

Names of those involved are being held until the next of kin can be notified.

"We certainly want to express our sorrow and grief to the families of those that have been killed and injured, and salute the brave men and women in uniform who do in fact put their lives on the line every day to defend their country," Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said in a briefing. "In this instance it was a disposal unit that was actively working to destroy some weapons that had been found, and for whatever reason, one of them went off."

There was combat in the Khost area, south of Kabul over the weekend, the Defense Department reports.

"On Saturday a team of U.S. Special Forces and Afghan military forces exploited a suspected enemy complex. During the mission, they located several weapons storage sites containing mines, rockets, explosives, and antiaircraft artillery pieces that we assess were used for training," Gen. Richard Myers, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a press briefing. "A convoy carrying U.S. and Afghan forces was fired upon, and an AC-130 gunship was called in to support the friendly forces. The aircraft located and fired on the enemy position, killing several of the enemy.

"Also this weekend, there were two incidents of suspected rocket-propelled grenade fire in the vicinity of Khost. On Saturday two suspected rocket-propelled grenades impacted near an airfield in that area, and although there are U.S. and Afghan military forces in the general area, there were no injuries to friendly personnel. In fact, it's uncertain whether the friendly forces were actually even targeted by the weapons," Myers added. "And then again, on Sunday, two more suspected rocket-propelled grenades were fired in the same area, although these appeared to have impacted some two kilometers away from the airfield. Again, no damage or injuries were sustained by friendly forces, nor is it clear whether friendly forces were actually the target."

The military action has been successful so far, Rumsfeld said, but there is still much work to be done.

"There have been various reports of violence in Afghanistan recently, and while we've made good progress in restoring stability to Afghanistan, clear-

Wisconsin

THE DAILY CARDINAL (U. WISCONSIN)

(U-WIRE) MADISON, Wis. – In a discussion titled "Trans-Atlantic Relations: A Norwegian Perspective," Norwegian Ambassador to the United States Knut Vollebaek spoke on U.S. and European foreign relations since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks Tuesday in Ingraham Hall.

Vollebaek said because Norway is not a member of the European Union, the country can give a neutral outlook on the changes in U.S.-European foreign relations.

While Vollebaek said there are not necessarily problems between the United States and Europe, there is a difference in positions.

"The kind of 'conflict,' if you call it that, it's kind of big brother, small brother," he said. "It's a family feud."

After Vollebaek spoke, the audience was given a chance to ask questions on the topic. Most questions dealt with the United States' role as a military leader.

One audience member asked why the United States is criticized for leading other countries in military force.

In response, Vollebaek said European countries like Norway need to prove to the United States that they can provide help and act multilaterally, with help from NATO.

"The attack of Sept. 11 was considered an attack on all [NATO] members," he said. "Needless to say, being a military superpower is a thankless job."

Vollebaek assured the audience that Norway was "on board" for a short-term military force against terrorism.

According to him, the United States and Europe view the terrorist attacks in different ways.

"Europe is focused on long-term perspectives while the U.S. is focused on the immediate military threat," he said.

These different views, Vollebaek said, were "mutually reinforcing" and should not prevent the United States and Europe from using the same tactics to stop terrorism.

"Both sides of the Atlantic need to pull together to get the U.S. and Europe to pursue the same strategy," he said.

Another difference, Vollebaek said, was the United States' focus on the conflict with Iraq. He said although Europe agrees Saddam Hussein is dangerous, we should not necessarily target Iraq in the War on Terrorism.

The speech was sponsored by the European Studies Alliance, the International Institute and the Scandinavian Studies Department.

DAILY ILLINI (U. ILLINOIS)

(U-WIRE) CHAMPAIGN, Ill. – Prince El Hassan bin Talal of Jordan called for a "law of peace" and code of conduct for Middle Eastern nations during a speech Wednesday at the Krannert Center of Performing Arts at the University of Illinois.

He said the problem that plagues the Middle East is a fear of peace. He stressed Middle Eastern nations need to take steps to think more globally instead of simply focusing locally.

"I believe in one civilization of 10,000 cultures," El Hassan said. "I believe in democracy not only within states but also between states."

El Hassan is the brother of the late King Hussein and earned degrees from Oxford University. He has written five books and sits on several committees focusing on religious and humanitarian issues. He supported U.S. efforts in the Middle East, while stressing common bonds.

"If we all believed in the Ten Commandments and all practiced the Ten Commandments, we wouldn't be in this situation in the first place," El Hassan said in reference to violence in the Middle East.

Audience members passed through metal detectors before they were allowed to enter the Tryon Festival Theater, where El Hassan spoke.

Outside, members of the University's pro-Palestinian Democratic Solidarity Committee called his speech "posturing." The committee is part of a campaign urging the University to divest in Israel. They handed out fliers asking students to question El Hassan's stand on Palestinians, unity and peace.

"From what I hear, he's being very Clinton-esque by cracking jokes and avoiding questions and committments rather than taking them on," said Aaron Love, a graduate student and committee spokesman. He was concerned that El Hassan pushed Middle Eastern nations to get along in light of more than 50 years of oppression of Palestinians.

El Hassan and other Jordan officials refuse to face the Palestinian issue because of good economic relations with Israel, saying the government has arrested leaders and intimidated people who speak out, Love said.

Lindsay Zoeller, sophomore in LAS, attended the lecture after news about conflict captured her interest. She said she was impressed by what El Hassan said.

"Students need to become more aware of global situations," she said. "By bringing someone like the Prince of Jordan to campus, the University is helping to extend students' knowledge of the situation. Also, he had a quick wit we could all appreciate and helped us laugh a little in light of serious issues."

Texas

THE BATTALION (TEXAS A&M U.)

(U-WIRE) COLLEGE STATION, Texas – A Texas A&M University student was released from College Station Medical Center with minor injuries Thursday after having a seizure while driving his Ford Bronco, taking him through parts of the A&M golf course and across George Bush Drive three times.

Keith Krueger, a senior chemical engineering major, was traveling eastbound on George Bush Drive Wednesday around 12:15 p.m. when the seizure began. He lost control of his car and eventually hit a Texas A&M off-campus bus, with 12 students and a driver aboard, traveling on the Aggieland route. The bus was waiting at the stoplight at the intersection of George Bush Drive and Anderson Street, heading to campus. Another bus, also on the Aggieland route, was waiting at the same intersection to head southbound onto Anderson.

Krueger first swerved right on George Bush toward the A&M golf course, then swerved around heading southbound toward Anderson, nearly hitting the Aggieland bus that was about to turn. The Bronco went up on a curb and across the Anderson intersection, where it a hit a light post, propelling the vehicle back toward the golf course. Krueger then drove onto the golf course, circled back around again, headed southbound on George Bush Drive and finally hit the bus sitting at the Anderson traffic light.

"He basically went in a huge circle, driving across George Bush twice," said Lt. Ron Sigler, the public information officer with the College Station Police Department.

Krueger was treated for minor injuries at the College Station Medical Center and released, Sigler said. None of the students on the bus were injured.

Brad Porter, a junior wildlife and fisheries major, was sitting in the third row on the bus that was struck. When Krueger hit the light pole, Porter said he could see him slumped over the steering wheel.

Porter said that when Krueger hit the bus, the Bronco hit close to the bus' driver-side front tire. The car finally stopped and witnesses ran over to turn off his car and make sure he was not injured.

"The ambulance responded quickly, but we woke up by the time the ambulance got there," Porter said. "He looked like he didn't know what had happened."

The police officer who responded to the accident was required to take the names of all the students on the bus. Porter said they stayed at the accident scene for 20 to 30 minutes. Students were about 15 minutes late to class, Porter said.

Krueger's Bronco did not hit any other cars, and no other injuries were reported.

Conduct code sparks debate after riot

By Joanna Dornfeld
MINNESOTA DAILY (U. MINNESOTA)

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS – Over the next few weeks University of Minnesota officials will grapple with how and when the student conduct code should be enforced.

Last Monday student life Director Robert Jones said students arrested during the riot following the April 6 NCAA hockey championship victory could be suspended or expelled because of their actions.

So far, no reports have been filed with Student Judicial Affairs against any of the 25 people arrested. At least 11 are University students.

Betty Hackett, Student Judicial Affairs director, said she can't determine what penalty students might face until the office has looked over the reports.

Hackett said penalties will be assessed based on the infraction's severity. She said it is too soon to determine whether students will be suspended or expelled.

"We try to keep the student in our community when we find that their behavior has been adequately addressed," she said.

Anyone can report a complaint to Student Judicial Affairs. The office reviews the complaint and decides whether there is enough information to charge the student. The student then has the option either to meet with judicial affairs staff and come to an informal resolution or go before the Campus Committee on Student Behavior.

But some students said they think the administration and police are trying to make examples of a few individuals.

Joe Micheletti, a biology senior, said he was arrested just after 10 p.m. on the corner of Fourth Street Southeast and 15th Avenue Southeast while on his way to The Library Bar and Grill to celebrate the Gophers' win.

Micheletti said he called an officer a "bitch" after the officer used profanity to address someone nearby.

"The situation was highly publicized," Micheletti said. "I think they're overreacting."

Micheletti said he is not concerned about being either suspended or expelled because he believes his charges will be dropped.

Hackett said the riot will incite debate about whether arrests made off campus should be considered by the University administration.

"If they're off University property, I don't think they should have any say," Micheletti said. "If it's on University property, I think that should be up to the board."

The code of conduct does not directly address this question, stating only the University "has an obligation to protect its property and the property of members of its community from theft, damage, destruction, or misuse."

Normally an offense must be committed on campus for it to be brought before Student Judicial Affairs, but it depends on the nature of the offense and where it occurred, Jones said.

"The University has a fundamental concern with conduct which breaches the peace, causes disorder, and substantially interferes with the rights of others," the code states. "The University has a special interest in behavior which threatens or actions which imperil the physical and mental health and safety of members of the University community."

Nicholas Vannucci, a College of Liberal Arts freshman, said he was arrested on the corner of Fourth Street Southeast and 14th Avenue Southeast between 2 and 3 a.m.

Vannucci said the University shouldn't punish the students arrested in the April 6 riot because the University doesn't consistently punish students arrested or cited by police.

"It doesn't concern them," he said. "It doesn't affect the way you should be educated."

Vannucci said he is disappointed the University administration has not been more supportive of the students arrested. He said if the University "turns their back on him," he will transfer to another school.

Along with questions about the code of conduct, administrators are looking into student allegations police used excessive force.

"We'll be looking at all of these issues," Jones said. "It's not that we're not concerned about that."

Jones said the University has not seen any evidence yet to back up the students' claims.

"We're just in the process of gathering information at this point," he said.

of liberty without due process of law."

"Nothing is more important to a woman's liberty than the ability to make such decisions regarding her pregnancy," Weddington said. The court recognized pregnancy was fundamental and could not be regulated strongly.

The state tried to argue life began at conception, but Weddington said the Constitution says those who are citizens are limited to "those persons born or naturalized in the United States. It doesn't say a thing about where or when the child is conceived," she said.

In preparing to argue in front of the Supreme Court, Weddington said she received the support of obstetricians and a multitude of religious organizations that felt "it was not the right of the government to make so important a decision in the place of women," she said.

"I thought that if you won a case 7-2, that was like being written in concrete," she said of the court's decision. "But from what we've seen, it's more like being written in sandstone."

She said legislation at the state level has undermined Roe v. Wade, which faces numerous threats today.

Should the balance of power in the Supreme Court shift hands from pro-choice proponents to pro-life proponents, "abortion wouldn't be illegal automatically," Weddington said.

"I like to think of Roe v. Wade as a space shield, like one in science fiction films. It protects women. If it is overturned, that space shield evaporates and gives way for the state or federal government to take away a woman's right to choose," she said.

During the reception on the Korean War Memorial in Washington, D.C., Weddington said, "Freedom is not free."

"People with money will always find a place to go. But for a lot of women in this country without a lot of money, it's a big issue," she said.

Since Roe v. Wade, Weddington has served in the Texas House of Representatives and as an aide to former President Jimmy Carter. A recipient of the Margaret Sanger award, Planned Parenthood's most distinguished honor, she was named "Texas Woman of the Century" in 1999.

ly, getting a peaceful environment will take a good deal of time. The country is fragmented politically. It does not have a strong tradition of democracy, as we all know, and I think any expectation that it will suddenly transform itself into a Western-style democracy ever, let alone instantaneously, is misplaced," Rumsfeld said. "What we're hoping is that as the people return to their homes from being internally displaced, and as people from refugee camps outside and the Afghan Diaspora return home, that there – and as the political process goes forward – that the combination of those things will produce a more peaceful environment."

The progress Rumsfeld says has been significant.

"Last fall, with the help of Afghan allies and coalition forces, the Taliban regime and the al Qaeda were cast out. The terrorists are either dead, or they're on the run. They are less able to plan, less able to finance and less able to launch attacks than they had been previously. An interim government is in place," Rumsfeld said. "Peacekeepers are patrolling in some trouble spots. The Afghan national army is beginning to be trained. New hospitals have opened. Vast amounts of food and other humanitarian relief have been supplied and will continue to be supplied. Women are able to go outside and go to school, go to hospitals and serve in government. The Afghan people, for the most part, have a chance to vote and speak relatively freely. And as a result, there is at least a hope for a brighter future."

Lombardi scares many

But we need the presence

John Lombardi has been selected by University President William Bulger as our next chancellor here at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst.

And while Lombardi's appointment to the position still needs to be approved through the Board of Trustees, a fair share of the University is already shaking in its administrative boots.

Why? That's simple – John Lombardi has a reputation. He has a reputation for being "the boss," for being a tough-minded, sarcastic leader that doesn't back down.

This has led to controversy. Many on campus are familiar with Lombardi's "Oreo" controversy, where he called his boss "an Oreo, black on the outside and white on the inside."

That isn't acceptable, but it does little to overshadow all of the good that Lombardi could do for the University of Massachusetts. Lombardi's tireless fundraising played no small part as the University of Florida's endowment grew from $153 million to $582 million between 1990 and 1999. Lombardi also angered some on the Board of Regents by directly lobbying legislators for increased funding rather than going through more conventional channels.

It's hard to argue with his methods financially, though. Plain and simple, Lombardi lifted the University of Florida to higher levels. Both the size and the quality of the student body increased dramatically during Lombardi's tenure. Student body size leapt from 33,300 students to 44,000 between 1990 and 1999. At the same time, the university was able to improve its quality of education to the point where at the time of his resignation, U.S. World News and Report listed UF as 16th on its list of the best public universities in the United States.

There are many at the University of Massachusetts that are afraid of all this. They're afraid of the numbers, afraid of the dynamic personality, and most of all, afraid of change. UMass has had a leadership vacuum for one year now, and during that year progress has stagnated. In many ways, stagnation has become what is comfortable here for various groups of administration, faculty, and alumni. Based upon previous results, Lombardi will change that.

The University of Massachusetts is in serious financial trouble and facing somewhat of identity crisis because of that. It needs a dynamic leader. It needs direction. It needs a way to creatively increase its low funding.

John Lombardi will provide for all of those needs. He will ruffle feathers. He will upset groups as he "shoots from the hip." And he will make some dramatic changes in the way that the University is run.

But this is what we will pay the man for. We need these dramatic changes. We need this creativity. We need this direction because without it, our university will continue to flounder. Mediocrity and the University of Massachusetts in the same sentence should be enough to scare anyone involved with the UMass family into trying something new in the best interests of education offered here. Based upon the credentials of the candidates for the job and the raw facts available, no individual seems better suited to make these changes than John Lombardi. Scary or not, we need the dynamic presence to ensure the success of our University.

Marriage not only option

This past weekend we had a bachelorette party at my lovely house. It was enjoyable, but it's not a practice I believe in. I mean marriage.

Okay, okay I believe in marriage. Don't get me wrong: flowers, white dress, ice sculptures and what have you, that's all lovely. If you love someone enough and you feel like you'd like to grace them with your presence for the rest of their life, then great, may the two of you live happily ever after, or at least for a few years.

But if I could address my reading audience this week, I'd like to dispel some common myths about the female gender's beliefs in the institution of marriage. I am a female (note: unfortunate photo) and as a female I pay attention when men voice their female stereotypes – I.e., women can't drive, barbecue, function in society, etc. One night while watching VHJ with some gentlemen, one of them noted, "Man, it would be awesome to be a rock star. I think that's like every guy's dream, it's like the female equivalent of getting married."

I was absolutely offended by this statement, and I don't really get offended. I couldn't believe that anyone would make the assumption that I would choose being tied down to one human and his spawn for forty-plus years over traveling the world and having my own "Behind the Music." And so I was irate and I thought to myself, "Self, do all men think that the only goal of a female is to get hitched?!" Certainly I don't have visions of myself done up in white taffeta or the huge rock my fiancée will put on my finger. Nor am I picking out the patterns for my bridesmaids' dresses. But the truth is that a lot of women do constantly dream of their future wedding day. And, though, that was fine fifty years ago, hasn't the time arrived when getting married isn't our most focused goal?

Whenever I go home, the first question my father asks is, "Are you engaged yet?" Besides the fact that he wants to get rid of me, he thinks because he married my mother when she was a pup that I too will be wed by the time I'm 22. Honestly, that was like a billion years ago. I'm not saying that the union of marriage is bad. Certainly it is a beautiful thing to be married and grace the world with wonderful children. It is noble to raise children and face the challenges that having a family presents every single day.

> "We're not a generation of Donna Reeds, are we?"

But it is not all that I live for. It is something I will do (that's assuming someone would have me for an intended eternity) after I accomplish other goals. The only reason I'd have a big wedding is because it would be an awesome party.

Haven't we women learned that we can accomplish all sorts of things? Haven't we seen what women do? Have we learned nothing from the likes of Amelia Earhart, Dorothy Parker and Oprah? There are smart young women everywhere doing their own thing who know that marriage is a future possibility but certainly not the only option, right? I mean, help me out here. We're not a generation of Donna Reeds, are we? Am I totally delusional in thinking that the 1950s have come and gone? And do all gentlemen believe that this is what women want?

I constantly hear uncertainty voiced about relationships that one partner feels "aren't going to go anywhere in the long-run." The people I hear these sort of statements from are like 21. Does this mean that the only reason you should date someone is if you plan to marry them? Can we not just enjoy another's company and leave it at that? If we spend the rest of our lives together, then we do and if we don't, we don't. Are we so saturated with the formula; (meet someone + spend five years together + get married + wait a few years = have 2.3 children) that we would totally disregard the option of a life that strays from that constant?

I am in no way criticizing the married life. I am simply saying that it is not the only means to an end, and vice versa.

Marriage is serious business. It isn't something to be taken lightly. But simply because society sells me Bride Monthly, should I be hiring a D.J.? Just because people look down upon a 26-year-old woman who doesn't have an engagement ring on her finger, should I be selecting an entree? I think not, I have a world tour to plan.

Over my dead body:

American vengeance lives!

AARON LORENZ

Last year, a remarkable event took place. The event got sparse media coverage but speaks volumes about America's values and integrity. The Nobel Foundation, hallowed for its six Nobel Laureates distributed each year, nominated a death row inmate for the Nobel Peace Prize. Stanley "Tookie" Williams, on death row for the 1979 killing of a convenience store clerk and 1981 murder of a family of three, was nominated for the coveted award. Williams' nomination sheds light on two connected issues in America's "justice" system: rehabilitation and symbolism.

Rehabilitation, the foundation to an educated society, reminds us of being children. When our parents told us to go our room as kids because we violated some house rule, the sound of them walking down the hall, after you thought about your "crime," meant you would be lectured on what you did wrong and what you learned in your room. Once you showed that a lesson was learned, you were free again.

For a death row inmate, freedom is not part of his vocabulary. Symbolism, America's favorite current theme, entails the idea that if you show you are the best and are always right, respect will follow. The latest policies of George II remind us why Williams is on death row and what America wants him to symbolize.

Williams was a leading figure in the formation of the Los Angeles-based street gang, "Crips." In 1979, after killing a convenience store clerk, Williams supposedly bragged about the shooting. Later, he supposedly killed and robbed a family in its hotel room. On death row since 1981, Williams has worked on the present and a future for those outside his San Quentin cell. In 1992, in collaboration with a San Francisco area non-profit organization, Williams began penning his story of crime and death row for children. His books focus on keeping children off the streets, out of jail and, away from a life of crime. The message of anti-gang has made Williams some monies, which he donated to anti-gang community groups. His current work is the "Internet Project for Street Peace" which is an anti-gang web site. To all accounts, he seems to symbolize what it means to work on remedying past wrongs. Yet, America insists on employing the death penalty.

> "Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., a Nobel Laureate, would be disappointed in America's inability to forgive."

Williams, nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize, will soon be executed by the State of California under the authority of the United States of America. Why is it that the Norwegian Nobel Committee recognizes true integrity yet the "justice" system seems to believe that offenses, even those as grievous as murder, deserve to quash the life of a possible Nobel Laureate? Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., a Nobel Laureate, would be disappointed in America's inability to forgive. That is what capital punishment is about: vengeance. Vengeance is simply the manifestation of a human being's inability to forgive. So I ask you, as America bombs Afghanistan, prepares for Iraq, and deploys military forces all around the world: what does this all symbolize?

The Williams case goes beyond the barbaric notion of the death penalty and squarely addresses why America is a contradiction – a nation wanting peace but unwilling to suffer for it. When George Wallace stood on those steps in Alabama and yelled, "Segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever," none of us thought he would ever change those hateful views. Before his death in 1998, he did. When Tookie Williams helped establish the Crips in Los Angeles more than three decades ago, no one around him thought he would ever change. He did when he began his crusade, vindicated by his Nobel nomination. I wonder if he will be nationally recognized or escorted to his death bed. Of course, the State of California and the U.S. Government do not want to recognize Williams' great deeds to society because that would undermine the legitimacy of their system of state sanctioned killing. However, their silence symbolizes their lack of faith in human possibility. Instead of supporting justice, the Department of Justice hides behind its $8000 curtains and calls for the death penalty to Zacarias Moussaoui. If we are to buy the elitist notion that America sets an example for the world to follow, the world is following a weak leader.

This week, U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft announced that he is indicting Lynne Stewart, attorney for convicted 1993 World Trade Center bomber Sheik Abdel Rahman, for conspiracy. After listening to private tape recordings between attorney and client, Ashcroft has called for four indictments. He wrote, "We will not look the other way when our institutions of justice are subverted. We will not ignore those who claim rights for themselves when they seek their destruction for others." I can imagine that Mumia Abu-Jamal and Tookie Williams would pose the same argument to Ashcroft. I am reminded again of America's contradiction – the unwillingness to grant liberty and freedom because it believes that such noble notions come without sacrifice. Williams (and Mumia) symbolize hope and integrity while America's actions display its need for incarceration.

In January of this year, George II stood in front of his partisan audience and exclaimed that he would only abandon his tax plan "over his dead body." If only he had such passion for issues of justice. If so, maybe Williams would get credit (and make Dr. King proud) for "transforming jails from dungeons of shame to havens of freedom and human dignity." Instead, the world recognizes what America truly symbolizes: vengeance lives!

Everybody's talkin' at me

As graduation fast approaches for many of us, it will soon be time to announce who the vaunted graduation/inspirational speaker will be. Judging by the past few years, we shouldn't get our hopes up. Billie Jean King and Kelsey Grammer may be great people, but what the hell do they have to say at a college graduation? To aid UMass from making these same mistakes, I have developed a list of potential speakers for graduation.

George Zimmer, founder of The Men's Warehouse. Ok, we have all heard the ads of people showing up to these stores after they have closed, minutes before a business meeting or seconds before a date, but they were all satisfied with the exceptional service they got. Here's the UMass ad: "It was two days before graduation and we had forgotten to book in a speaker to address the audience. We had no idea what to do, so we called George Zimmer and offered him a large cash sum. By the grace of God he was able to make it. Thanks, George."

Alison Phair, my girlfriend's five-year-old sister. Why? Because she is hilarious and could probably teach us more in a couple of minutes of weird babbling than an ex-athlete could teach us in hours. Plus she's cheap. Honestly, we could slide her some candy and be done with it. More money for the budget next year! Humor? We got that. One day a couple weeks ago this girl asked me while holding a dime, if God was the person pictured on it. I said yes.... it was a guess.

Jeff Smith, star of PBS's "The Frugal Gourmet." Oops. This just in. Jeff Smith went to jail for having improper relations with people too young to be considered "legal." He's out.

Screech from "Saved by the Bell." Dustin Diamond (his real name) would be an awesome guy to have talk at our graduation. Actually, who the hell am I kidding? I'd just want him there to throw things at. Poor Screech. His father, in charge of all of his money, wasted his savings in crappy business dealings, so now the guy has nothing to show for years and years of looking like a stupid unic on television. He's got to be a unic, there's no way to get your voice that high if you are not.

The crazy "no nukes" lady from the Campus Center. The no nukes lady is a damn institution here at UMass. Anyone who would spend literally years of their lives with her ass parked at a table in the Campus Center and preach to the already very liberally converted populous at UMass deserves something. Probably an all-expenses paid one-way ticket to France, but it's something. She could alert all of us on the evil doings of the government and finally engage a member of the Republican Club in a lively debate about the virtues of nuclear bombs.

Ron Popeil, master inventor and seller of all things crappy on TV. Popeil is an idol of mine. Anyone who can get away with selling millions of dollars in spray-on hair is worthy of a graduation speech. I guess it would be more like a mass demonstration because he would show us the food dehydrator, the new rotisserie oven he invented, or he may take a few casts with his "pocket fisherman" (a real product, not a weird reference to his penis). All of this and a free set of utensils for the low, low price of three easy payments of $49.95.

Here's an idea – a point/counterpoint speech with Sut Jhally on one side and our own Sam Wilkinson on the other. It's the UMass equivalent of the main event at Wrestlemania. It is a duel that has been going on for several years now and both men have agreed to end it at graduation. An 18-foot-tall steel cage will surround them when the debate begins. The cage is actually to protect the combatants, so throngs of communication majors cannot jump in and help Jhally as he and Wilkinson square off.

Roger Clemens. We can lure him in by telling him that there is an all-you-can-eat barbecue going on in the stadium. When he walks in we hit him in the knees with sticks. When the sticking is all done we will put him on the same plane with the crazy nuke lady and ship him off to France, where French police will lightly slap him as punishment.

Raffi, noted children's performer. I was not a huge follower of Raffi in my days as a young'un, but I know a lot of you were. I was way into Van Halen back in those crazy days of the early 1980's. Your taste was a little less refined than mine. No worry though, you can relive those days of yore when we bring Raffi back. It may be a bit different than you remember however as Raffi has formed a new band, "The Happy Clowns of Destruction." I'm sure he'll throw in some old stuff to get the crowd into it. They get my vote, unless they are booked. In that case, we're really screwed.

Ong speaks

By Jake Lilien
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In Hang Ong's novel Fixer Chao, an uneducated street hustler makes a fortune by posing as an expert in the ancient Chinese art of feng shui. This plot may sound more like the basis of a "Saturday Night Live" sketch than an acclaimed literary work, yet the novel continues to receive accolades for both for the quality of its writing, and its scathing indictment of the American class system.

On Thursday night, Ong appeared at the Odyssey Bookshop in South Hadley, where he read passages from his novel and spoke about his creative process. He explained that his original concept for the novel came from a daydream he had while watching a boring play.

"Instead of paying attention to what was happening onstage," he explained, "I envisioned...two people waiting in anticipation of the advice of an expert. And I had to ask what was wrong with the picture – and I figured that the 'expert' was a fake."

Ong went on to explain that he later read a glowing article in an upscale magazine about a feng shui expert, who rearranged the apartments of wealthy Manhattan clients. The images of the "well-fed" feng shui master and the crooked expert from his imagination melded into one, and he began writing Fixer Chao.

The book chronicles the life of William Paulinha, a former gay prostitute, who is recruited into a scheme by an unsuccessful writer known only as "Shem C." Shem convinces Paulinha to wage war on the upper class by posing as Feng Shui Master Chao, an expensive consultant.

The lynchpin of Shem's plan is that "Master Chao" will actually rearrange apartments in a way that will create the worst possible energy, and presumably destroy the inhabitants' lives. Paulinha, despite being Filipino rather than Chinese, successfully passes himself off as a feng shui master, and proceeds to wreak havoc on New York's upper class.

Ong explained that that the idea to make a caustically funny novel wasn't an easy one.

"I'm very familiar with Asian-American literature," he said, "and it generally deals with Asian-American pioneers and touching family relations. You'll read about the immigrant experience, and the vindication of hard work."

He knew that a sarcastic, comedic novel like Fixer Chao might seem out of place in such a genre, but decided to buck tradition. He said that he originally intended to write a "pulpy" novel, but his ambitions slowly became broader, and he decided to tackle the issues of discrimination and classism.

One attendee of the reading, Mount Holyoke English professor Jennifer Ho, asked Ong about the reaction of Asian-American academics to the book.

"I'm curious about their response," she said. "Have professors come up to you and said, 'Finally! Thank you!'"

"I actually expected more of an outrage," he responded, "in terms of conservative Asian-Americans asking, 'Why are you making fun of this?' But the overall reaction has been positive."

Big Trouble

By Michael Delano
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BIG TROUBLE
Starring Tim Allen and Rene Russo
Directed by Barry Levinson
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Like the Dave Barry book it's adapted from, the star of Barry Levinson's Big Trouble is Miami. The sun must just beat down a little harder over that part of southern Florida, forming a glowing circus tent that houses all sorts of crazies, gangsters, lowlifes, big hearts, and overall generally unhinged people just itching to have their stories told.

Big Trouble doesn't settle for telling one story; it wants to tell a whole bunch of little ones, revving them up and watching them whiz by each other, occasionally colliding. But unlike Pulp Fiction or the more recent Amores Perros, the disparate storylines in the film don't just rub shoulders in a clever way; they merge bombastically in elaborately staged scenes. This approach is what gives the Miami of the film its lifeblood; this isn't a story that happens to take place in Miami, the story is Miami, or at least a hyper-exaggerated attempt at chronicling the zany composition and connectivity of this particular city.

Explaining all of the plot twists, character profiles and interactions would require charts, graphs, Powerpoint, and a laser pointer, so here are the basics. Eliot Arnold (Tim Allen) is a former newspaper columnist whose son Matt is on a mission to squirt Anna Herk (Rene Russo)'s daughter Jenny with a water gun as part of a school ritual. As Matt and a friend hide in the bushes of the Herk manor waiting for the perfect squirting opportunity, he is joined by hitman Henry Algott (Dennis Farina) and a business friend, who are on a contract to kill Jenny's father Arthur (Stanley Tucci) for unpaid dues. Amidst the chaos of this meeting are Puggy (Jason Lee), a filthy vagabond living in a tree in the Herks' yard and police officers Monica Ramiro (Janeane Garofalo) and Walter Kramitz (Patrick Warburton), who are called to the scene of the disturbance.

This scene at the Herk house is just the jump off to many other expertly staged and executed comic disasters. If you're not completely turned off by the sheer coincidence and ridiculousness of it all, you'll probably be smiling when Heavy D shows up as a federal agent and "Jackass" Johnny Knoxville bumbles around as an inept criminal.

Levinson crafts the big screen Big Trouble in exactly the right way, namely letting the story itself do the talking. There are no camera tricks and the soundtrack is inconsequential. The fear of mean ol' Hollywood ruining a smart little book is gone; the look is sleek and professional and there is a laundry list of high-caliber comedic talent, but the spirit of Barry's book is alive and well.

Two of the most striking aspects of the film stylistically are the colors and pace. The Miami locales shimmer at night, and the bright whites and greens of the scenery mix with the vibrant red hues of the costumes for a look that's almost as colorful as the content. Levinson also wisely keeps the action at a furious pace from beginning to end, leaving the weak jokes in the dust and wasting no time in developing unnecessary drama or character profiles.

Big Trouble was severely delayed due to content involving a bomb on a plane, but aside from unsettling connections to current events such as that, it isn't indebted to any particular trend or time period for its humor. It's smart and fast, and the seemingly random cultural references (like Andy Richter's character's theme song and the Martha Stewart dog) are of most interest to people that read the book. The book was a hilarious Dave Barry mindtrip filled with characters that were constructs of many years working and living in Miami, and the movie is just as effective at plunking the audience right down in the middle of that crazy world.

QUiZ THE PiZZ!!!

©NICK PIZZOLATO / LEVITT-PICKMAN

©Nick Pizzolato – ladies man, baseball lover, and this week's rogue advice columnist.

What makes me qualified to write an advice column for New England's largest college daily newspaper? Basically Pizz rhymes with quiz. That's about it. All these answers come from my sense of logic and reasoning and should really not be considered actual advice, unless you too are a 23-year-old soon-to-be-graduate of the University of Massachusetts majoring in Communication. You are better off with the advice from Ask Elena, but hopefully, milk will come out of your nose when you read mine.

Fellow Paesan – My girlfriend said the other day that she hates hairy men, but I'm mad crazy Italian. Should I keep my hairy torso and give up her love? Or should I get out the wax... ouch!!! – Wookie in Washington

She obviously doesn't love you and is looking for a way out of the relationship. She picks the "hairy men" as a symbol but she's really saying, "get the hell out of my life." So I say dump her and don't go through the pain of Nairing your body (as disturbing as that image is). But instead of just saying it's over, here's what you do – pick one flaw that she has. One single small flaw and harp on it. Say she breathes too heavy when she's on the phone. Next time you're on the phone with her or you're next to her when she picks up her celly, just get up in disgust. Scream, "I CAN'T TAKE THIS ANYMORE!!!" And walk out. That's it, no reason – just leave. It's even better if you have a ring to throw at her face. Just remember these words of wisdom from Annie Savoy in the film Bull Durham, "There's never been a ballplayer who slept with me who didn't have the best year of his career." Has this girl given you the best year of your college career? If not, dump her.

Yo Pizzdawg – Do you know about getting stains out of clothes? I had a little accident the other day outside of Charlie's and threw up a variety of colorful alcohols all over my purse and jeans. I know you must have stain removal tips for me, I see you at McMurphy's in your Hawaiian shirt all the time. – Painfully Stained

My secret to getting stains out of my hip, style-file, fashion plate garb is stain stick. And none of the generic CVS type, real name brand Stain Stick.

Nothing gets Bud Light and Antonio's out better than Stain Stick, the night after a crazy shindig or Southwest riot. Take the shirt in this picture for example, must me it's seen better days. But as you can see, it attracts the ladies like bugs to a zapper. YOWZA. And if that doesn't work keep in mind what Jimmy Dugan said in the chick baseball flop, A League of their Own, "There's NO crying in baseball." In other words take the clothes, burn them and put on a new pair to hit up the bar scene.

H to the Pizzo – Everyone tells me that I'm a trite pretentious bch. Should I stop quoting movies like Clueless (As if I would even do that! Whatever!) and Legally Blonde, as well as stop kicking people when they're bent over to tie their shoes? Or shall I just stop revving my Jetta's engine when all the poor pedestrians are crossing the street? – Better than U
